Consulship, seeing all the wars appealed, peace established, armes laid downe enery where, the comonwealth in good strength, the lawes honored, instice in authority, y Senate in their ancient glory, and y people restored by him to their rights of assembly to chuse their yearly magistrates. and to give our their commissions & charges according to their old custome: he began to reason the matter with himselfe, which of the twaine was most profitable, either to keepe (for the good of the state, and under the title of a Prince) the Empire which he had in his hands or whether he should render it vp vnto the people. He found himselfe grieued for that Antonius had oftentimes accused him of tyranny & vniust inuasion; and on the other part also he apprehended the fury of the people, & the factions of ambitious men, which like the billowes of the fea, would incontinently toffe in horrible fashion this vnconstantsea. Being thus perplexed, one day he tookaside Agrippa and C. Macenau, his two faithful friends, very wife men and of great experience about al others:& prayed them to tell him plainly without flattery, what they thought of it, being refolued to follow that which should be most expedient for the good of the commonwealth. Agrippa by an ample discourse did counsell him to render up to the people his principality & signiority. Macenas was of the contrary opinion, and gaue such counsell as Cafar followed, tempering both opinions, & made himself master in such fort that the people felt it not, but rather consessed that they needed fuch a Phyfitian to raife the vp againe from the incurable maladies they were fallen into. He thanked both his friends, gaue his neece Marcella to be the wife of Agrippa, and did him new honours, proceedeth to a new review of the citizens of Rome; and is chosen Prince of the Senate by Agrippa, who was then his companion in the Confulship. Furthermore, assuring himfelfe that so much good and honours as had bene communicated to the small and great, would make them they would not much paffe for their ancient dignities and liberty: & that the sweetnesse of the ease and rest they did enion, would make them forget all the good and euill past: he borowed of his magnanimity the maruellous counfell that followeth. He refolued to discharge himselse of the principality into the hands of all the Senate, to render it vnto the people; hoping that the Senate seeing his affection so to submit himself to the accustomed order, & not to seeke a domination and government ill-willed, they would thanke him the more: that althe great perfons would lay afide the enuic which they might beare vnto him, and that the people would esteeme and loue him so much the more. Vpon this thought, and after he had acquainted some of the Senators withall that flood affected to him, to the end to win others by their meanes, he made an oration in open Senate, well studied, and fit for the time. Hauing made a long discourse of the great extent of the Empire, and of his insufficiency, he added vnto it, that this common burthen could not be carried but by the immortall gods: that he had continued some yeares to manage a part of it, and that experience had made him know that his shoulders were too weake to beare such a burthen as the principality, subject to infinite changes, and exposed to a thousand ambushes. He therefore required, the city being furnished with so many noble persons, that the affaires might be managed by many men, who ioyning themselucs together, might more easily satisfie the charges, then one alone: that in a good howre, having fet all things in good estate againe, he did put the commonwealth into the hands of the Senate and people of Rome. This oration diversly moved the Senators. Some of them thought, there was more art then truth in it. Others judged, that it was not expedient to put the estate into the power of many. The most of them enriched and made great by Casar, and that were risen vp by the ruines of their countrey, faid: that they should preferre that which now they had in hand, before all the time past, beaten with so many tempests. Many others enclined to that fide, not that they were in good earnest of that mind, but for feare to be looked upon with an euill eye, if they did speake against their companions. So then all of them with one The Senate consent vnaduisedly, rather then of a common and ripe judgement, began to beseech and adjure Cafar, that it would please him to be chiefe and preserver of the Empire, of the which he had set downe so many goodly and happy foundations. Immediatly they ordained that Cesars guard should have twife as much pay as they had before. Agrippa was of opinion, that they should casfierethe Spanish guard, and Cafar in their place should chuse a guard of ALMAINEs, knowing hands. wel that in those great bodies there was litle malice hidden, and lesse subtilty; and that they were apeople that tooke more pleasure to be commanded, then to command.

Hebeing thus established in his Empire by the consent of the Senate and people, to the end they should not thinke he would lift himselfe vp about measure, or to give fore footing to a perpetuall Monarchie: he would not accept the charge to prouide for the affaires of effate, and pireforten the gouernment of the Provinces, but for the space of ten yeares: with condition to give vp yeares. his charge before this terme, if things were sooner setled in their full estate. First therefore, he left a part of the Provinces vnto the Senate and people, to take care for the government of the same: and for himselfe, he kept those that were not yet in order, and in the which he should be driven to make warre. In those that were quiet, he established Proconsuls: and for others, he gouerned them by his Lieutenants, which had their leffon, according vnto the which they were bound to be directed. Among other lawes they were forbidden to leavie any money, or to gather men of warre together, or to affaile any Prouince, without the commandement of the Senate, or of Cafar. That forthwith when they fent any fucceffors, they should leaue their gouernment, and repaire to Rome within three moneths. He appointed also vnto the Proconfuls acertaine fumme of money to beare their charges for their horse and carriage of the stuffe. Furthermore he established a law, that the Proconfull or governour should not go to his Province appointed him, till the end of five yeares after his commission granted him: to the end that they which were convinced for taking of money corruptly, should pay to the Provinces the fine they should be condemned in and he deprived them of all estates and honors which through their euill behauiours had bene condemned in such fines. And further, he would not that the officers that had to deale in his affaires should have any authority, but to demand their stipends and money which the Provinces were bound to furnish. And because he would beautifie and adorne Rome, as the maiestic of the Empire required, he raised up Augustin many common buildings, and repaired many that had bene left vnfinished or ruined, leaving their of the names of the founders. His buildings among other were the temple of Apollo in the pallace, Rome, with the porch, and a librarie of GREEK and Latin books. Also the Monuments, and the parke, for the walkes and pleasure of the people of Rome. In his seventh Consulship, certaine Senators propounded that they should call him Romulus, for that he having preserved the city of Rome, it was as much bound vnto him, as vnto the first founder. But he would not accept of that name. Wherefore Munacius Plancus bethought himselfe of another, the which was given The name unto him by common confent of all, and he held it to his death: as also we will call him from of angular henceforth in all that remaineth to be set downe of his deeds: to wit Augustus. He not to M. Plance. feeme vnworthy of this name, and to cary himfelfe fo, that no man should repent his change of gouernment, began diligently to fet his hand to these affaires. He wisely reformed the ancient lawes, and made new that were very necessary. To make sure work in these affaires, he chose lawes refrom fix moneths to fix moneths fifteene Senators that had bene Confuls, and did privately formeth the acquaint them with all that was requisite to be done for the preservation of the quietnesse of the commonwealth, giving order that nothing should passe but it should be searched and examined to the bottome: saying that he would give the people lawes which they should all allow, and that he would not be his owne judge alone. Afterwards he reformed the affemblies of the city, where all things were caried by fuites, presents, and violence. He then restored the people their

Augustus care for eleftion of good Magiright, by voices to chuse the magistrates. And to cut off all suites, nee forbad them to make any rolle of suiters names, but of those that had layde downe great summes of mony, to the end that being consinced of their fuites, they should be put to their fines; adding also this ignominy, that fuch should be depriued of all estates & honors for the space of fine yeares. And surthermore, he finely hindred the bad practifes in elections, giuing order that none should be put in nomination but such as were vertuous and of good reputation. He left vnto the Magistrates their charges whole, and did alwaies require in all his Confulships that they shold give him two companions howbeit the Senate wold neuer agree vnto it. The yeare before, he had reduced the nuber of Senators to sixe hundred, all honourable men. At that time also he reestablished the ancient order and dignity cordaining that the Senate should have the superintendencie of the treasure, and of all the revenues that belonged to the people of Rome. That all the expences for the common. wealth shold be made by their ordinance. That the Senators shold have the hearing of alcrimes oftreason, conspiracie, ambushes, and offences to his Maiesties person: and that it should pertaine to them to give entertainement and answer that should be fit, to Ambassadors of nations. When in matters of importance he asked the aduice of the Senate, in flead of coming to the Prince of the Senate according to the accustomed manner, or to him that was appointed Confull, or to other Senatours by order: he made choise of any one of them which he thought good, to the end that enery one should give attentive eare, and be ready to deliver his opinion: and not to hold his head downe in his rancke, and content himselfe to be of other mens minds. He ordained also, that the whole body of the Senate should not assemble but from sisteene dayes to fifteene dayes: howbeit that in ordinarie matters the magistrates should thinke of that that were expedient. In the moneth of September and October, the Senatours were nor bound to meete, but onely foure hundred drawne by lot: who might establish any decree. And as for himselfe, to honour this company the more, the day of the affembly he never fallted any of the Senators apart, but all of them together in the counfell chamber when they were fet, and all of them name by name, the one after the other. If he would go out, and that he faid, he would detaine the companie no longer, he bad them farewell in the same manner that he had faluted them at his coming in. He ruled instice also civill and criminall, and willed that amongst other things the criminals accused by certaine enemies, should be set at libertie: with condition notwithstanding that they should be brought to prison againe, if the accuser did submit himselfe to receive the like punishment as the offender, if it were found heeslanderedhim. Moreouer, he made prouision for common workes, and reparations of bridges, causeys, and high wayes. And because he was determined to make a voyage into GAVLE, he established Messala gouernour of ITALY and of Rome, for seare lest any trouble should happen in his absence. But this place being troublesome vnto Messala, he besought Augustus he would discharge him: and therefore Agrippa was substituted, who ridde all ITALIE of a great number of thecues and robbers on high waies, and stayed the courses of many other troubles of the state.

The affaires of Rome and ITALIB being in so quiet estate, vnderstanding that England was full of ledition, Spaine next vnto the mountaines Pirenei in armes, and Gavie readie to rise: he opened the temple of Ianus, and tooke his journey to give order for all. But the Ambassadours of England preuented him, and promised tribute. Then he went to Gavle in NARE ONE, to draw nearer to Spaine. And so holding on his journy to NAREONE, he pacified the GAVLES, he made an exact numbring of all the GAVLES, of their goods, possessions, and flaues, and caused the rolles to be brought vnto him. He established lawes and customes incuery place, and deuided GAVLE into foure parts: of the which the first part was called NARBO-NENSE, which extendeth it selfe from the river of Var vnto the mountaines PIRENEI. AQVI-TAIN the second, vnto the river of GARONNE. The third, GAVLE LYONNOISE, vnto the river of Seine. Then GAVLE BELGICA, bordered with the river of Rhein; and rated all the GAVLS at ten milions of gold for a taxe. Now there remained no more for him to do, but to bring Spains to order: in the which the Romaines had made continuall warres the space of 200 yearestogether. Neuertheleisethe Cantaerians and Asturians (which are the Basques) and other people neighbours dwelling in the mountaines, they neither cared for Augustus, nor for the Empire: for they were euer in armes, and made incursions vpon the allies of the people of Rome, and did them great mischies: who complaining vnto Augustus of the great necessity they were brought vnto, he being neare vnto them, came to aide them; and found the Cantabrians belieging of a fort, having taken the town by it called SAGESAME. He charged them home with such furie that he left them dead in the place, after they had valiantly defended themselves. Afterwards he devided his army into three parts, & environed the country of the Cantabrians, who made head for the space of flue yeares, and did maruellous great hurt to the Romains: & majeth war if the ftreights wherby they might eafily enter into their country, had not bene discoursed vnto with the Augustis, they had sent him home againeto Rom E with shame. But having found the way to surprifethem on euery fide, he made a cruell warre vpon them, putting all to fire and bloud. They geth them retired with speed to one of their highest mountaines, with all that they could carrie with them. Forestreme The ROMAINES perceiving that it was too hard a match for them, if they should go thither to miler. fer upon to warlike a nation, & that could not be subdued by force: they made forts in the midst of the mountaine, and placed a strong guard there, to the end to famish the CANTABRIANS, and by that meanes to bring them to reason. But they on the other side, in stead of yeelding themselues, did abide all the miseries that any man can possibly thinke of: and it came to that passe, that even to sustaine nature the strong sonnes killed their old fathers, the mothers their infants, and the yong mendid deuoure the old eating vp their flesh. Vpon this euill, there followed another, to wit discord among them. Some would yeeld, others were of another mind. The former alledging, that they must needs submit themselves to the mercy of the ROMAINES: the other. that they should make a desperate fallie vpon the enemies campe, and so sell their lives. Their contention waxed so hote and violent, that the CANTABRIAN'S thrust out ten thousand of the ASTVRIANS with their wives and children, and compelled them to descend along the forts made by the Romaines: whom they intreated with the teares in their eyes to make them flanes, and to give them somewhat to eate. Tiberius then one of Casars Lieutenants, would not suffer them to be received, to the end to famish the one by the other, and to end this warre without any bloudshed. This poore people being depriued of sustenance and hope, and being afraid they should yet endure greater cuils, began to powne a venimous hearbe like vnto Smallige, and poisoned themselues. The young men killed themselues running one against another with their swords in their hands. The others, to the number of three and twenty thousand, camedowning most miserable estate from the top of the mountaine, and yeelded themselves to the discretion of the Romaines: who set aside ten thousand of the strongest of them, to serue them in the war which they intended to make against the Asyvrians. The rest were fold by troups, with condition that they should be carried farre from their country, and that they should not be made free, before they had serued them as slaues the space of thirty yeares. They disarmed ten thousand of them: which they bare so patiently, that many killed themselues with their owne hands, efteeming their life nothing without armes. They fay, that a litle child with a dagger killedhis father and brethren that were chained together, and that by the commandement of the father: and that a woman did the like to some of her kinsfolkes. And that many of these mountainers accustomed to rob passengers, being upon the gibber, sang out songs aloud, even at their death, shewing a joy and maruellous courage. Augustus being then in those parts, gaue leaue to the soldiers of his guard of Spantards to depart into the territory of the Gascons with great presents, & priviledge to enter in rancke amongst the Romaine legions. He build Saragovss E, and other townes, which he replenished with fouldiers, to bridle the courses and tumults of the CELTIBERIANS; and afterwards made a stone bridge over the famous river of Eber. Then having overthrowne the Conisces, friends of the Astvrians, taken their head city, and put all the inhabitants thereof to the fword: he fet upon the As TURIANS, who being entironed of Angainst all parts, and choosing rather to die then to be made slaues: burnt, killed, and poisoned themfelices, and with them many other of their neighbours. There were some of them yet left alive, Afterians, with whom the CANTABRIANS joyned and other their neighbours, and that a long time. These drines that people had this custome, that all goods were common amongst friends, and when one of them came to the other, he received and vied him as himfelf; and to also in adversity they ran one fortune, or else killed themselues immediatly after their friends were dead. Among them were certaine loose people gathered together out of divers parts, who resolved all together to go charge friends. the ROMAINES, and came to light with such a furie, that nothing but the night could separate them, having lost many of both sides. The next morning they began to joyne againe with more violence then before, and the fight continued euen till night, that the ROMAINE's obtained the Ggggg4 victory: but they confessed, that they neuer encountered with such cruell enemies. They that were left aliue fled into a towne, in the defence whereof they made them selled so be killed rather then to yeeld themselues. Augustus built certaine places there in that country, which afterwards by time were much enlarged. In this felfe fame yeare of his ninth Confulfhip, Term. tius Varro his Lieutenant subdued the SALASSIANS, which are those of the vale of OSTRE; he disarmed them, sold the young men by the drum, gaue part of the territory vnto the souldiers Prætorians, and built there acity called Av GV STA PRETORIA. Vinicius also appealed some troubles in GER MANTE, and made war very fortunately in divers places. By means of which victor ries, Augustus was called the eight time Imperator, as much to fay, as souer aigne Captaine: and they suffered him to weare from that time forth the first day of the yeare, a hat of Laurell, and a robe of triumph. At his returne he shut the temple of lanus the fourth time, married Cleonatra (the daughter of Antonius and Cleopatra) vnto Iuba the Storie-writer, overthrowne by Iulius Cafar in Africk, with a part of Mayritania and of Getylia, to reigne there. Hereduced into a province Gallogreeta and Lycaonia, which made a portion of a kingdome; and by reafon of his ficknesse notable to be present at the mariage of his daughter Iulia, whom Marcellus maried the fon of Octavia his fifter, he left all to the charge of Agrippa, and went to Rome. There being chosen Consult the tenth time, the Senate gaue him absolute power over the estate and lawes, to make and vndo them at his pleasure. They did him greater honours then before and gaue Marcellus his nephew before his time great offices in the commonwealth; and to Tiberius his wives sonne. He in token of thankfulnesse, gaue to every one of the people ten crownes apeece. Whilest these matters were in hand, the CANTABRIANS and their neighbours revolted. by subtilty caught some of the Romains, and cut their throats. Alius Lamia, gouernor in those parts, to be reuenged of this outrage, put al the whole country to fire and blood, destroyed some townes, and fold their young men by the drum. To be fliort, he followed them to hard, that he brought them in subiection. Alius Gallus gouernor of AGYPT, almost about the same time being fent by Augustus commandement with ten thousand men, fine hundred fouldiers of Herods guard, and fifteene hundred NABATEIANS wnder the conduct of a noble man of ARABIA called \bar{s}_{y} //eus: he did nothing to be accounted of, but discouer the country. But having lost the most part of his men within the defarts where this Syllens brought them, and ouercome the Sar EAN's in a battel, he was enforced to retire: Afterwards this Sylleus, for that he killed his king Obodaby

treason, he was taken prisoner, and beheaded by the decree of the Senate. Augustus being Consult for the eleventh time, the plague was in Rome, and for himselfe he was gricuously ficke, but restored agains to health by Antonius Musa his Phistion. The people therefore caused a statue to be set up to this Antonius, the Senate did him great honours, and in fauor of his profession, gaue immunitieto all others that from that time forth did practife Phifick. Furthermore, by many ceremonies they did flew the joy they had for the health of Augufus: and specially fathers of houshold dying, expressely commanded their childre to bring their facrifices to y Capitol with a title in great letters, faying: That ATTHE DAY OF THEIR DEATH THEY LEFT AVGVSTVS IN GOOD HEALTH. It was also ordained that fro that time forth they should never put any man to death, as often as Augustus entred into the city. Shortly after he did affociate with himfelfe Calpurnius Pifo in the Confulfhip, who had followed the partie of Pompey and of Brutus. Afterwards when he was gone from Rome into the country, he made Lucius Ceftius his deputie for him, an inward friend of Brutus and of his memory. Whereat the Senate maruelling, by decree made him perpetual! Proconful of the ROMAINE Empire. Tribune of the people, and gaue him power to affemble the Senate as often, and when it pleafed him. The people would have compelled him to have bene Dictator, but he bowing a knee caffing downe his long robe, and shewing his breast, befought them to discharge him of so odious an estate. In the meane time he accepted the decree of the Senate, & the charge to cause corne to be brought in, because of the dearth that chanced in Rome. In the which he served his turne by Tiberius created Quaftor at the age of nineteene yeares. As for Marcellus his nephew he was chosen Ædilis Curulus, who aided him to fet forthall the magnificent pompe of plaies, which he caufed to be plaied before the people. Every man judged that he should be the successor of all his power; but this young man of great hope, died shortly after, to the great griefe of every man: and no man can tell whether it was of natural ficknesse, or of poison given him by the practises of Linia. A litle before his death, Agrippa impatient to beare the rifing of this Marcellus whom he despited, went into As 1A vnder colour of another voyage. They fay that Angustus much troubled with ficknesse, returned to his first consultation, to put the commonwealth againe into the hands of the Senate and people; and for this cause he called for the Senators and al the other magistrates: vnto whom he gaue an account of the Empire: and that was a litle booke containing the numbring of all the riches, townes, and prouinces allies, legions, armies by fea and by land, of all the kingdomes and countries tributarie, of all the customs of the Empire of Rome, that which was necessarily to be leaused or released. But being somwhat amended againe, he changed his mind. And furthermore, having given audience to the ambassadors of Phrahartes king of the PARTHIans, which demanded a fon of his brought by Tyridates vnto Augustus, he sent backe the child, & suffered Tyridates to remain at Rom E, where he sumptuously entertained him. By this means he kept himselfe in friendship with the one and the other, and held the PARTHIANS in suspence, to the end they should alter nothing. At the beginning of the next yeare following, vnder the confulship of M. Claudius Marcellus, and of L. Arruntius, the famine increasing at Rome, he wisely provided for it. And then the people would constraine him by force to accept the Dictatorship, and threatned to set the pallace on fire and to burne all the Senators in it, if they refused to allow this decree. He would none of the office of Dictatorship, and did refuse also to be Censor, although that office had bene void the space of 28. yeares. But for a smunacius Plancus and Emilius Lepidus, who were chosen Censors, deserved themselves to be censured, because of their discords, Augustus without the name tooke vpon him to discharge it : and provided to reform infinite disorders that were in Rome, in apparel, countenances, companies, and in the fight of Fencers at the sharpe. At the same time Fannius Capio and L. Murana, having conspired against many differences him, and being discouered by Castricius, were taken as they thought to have escaped, and put to dertine the Astvalans and Cantabrians ill intreated by Carifius, they rebelled, but were ouercome in a fer battell, and the prisoners fold. The CANTABRIANS pre- of Fencers; ferring death before feruitude, killed, burnt, and poisoned the one the other. The Astvalans being ouercome the fourth time, did fubmit themselves, and their armes were taken from them in the fame time, Petronius gouernor of AGYPT, followed with 10000. footmen, and with 800. horse, went to make war with the Ethiopians, which dwell under ÆGYPT, who had inuaded and ruined certaine towns, ouerthrowne and caried away the statues of Augustus. Therupon he purfued them, and made them flie before him: took certaine places vpon them, and pierced far into their countrie: so that he inforced their Queene to send her ambassadours vnto Augufus(then wintering in the Ile of Samos) to pray peace, which he granted them paying tribute.

At the beginning of the Spring, he prepared himselfe to give order for the affaires in the East: but because they that bent themselves for the Consulship had almost put the city in alarme, and that in the end, notwithstanding the order he had set downe, the people had chosen men whom Augustus feared: through the aduice of Macenas, he made Agrippa come againe to governe ROME in his absence, and maried vnto him his daughter Iulia, Marcellus widow. Now whilest Agrippa gaue order for the affaires of the city, Jugustus tooke sea, and having provided for the affaires of Sicilia, he went into Grece, did much good for the Laced Emonians, and to the contrary, represed the pride of the ATHENIANS, from whom he tooke away the tribute Greece, and they had leavied of the Iles ÆGINA and ERETRIA. In the meanetime, though he made litle acthey had leavied of the Iles ÆGINA and ERETRIA. In the meanerime, though he made litle account of strangers ceremonies, yet he made himself to be received into the fraternity of mysterics and what he distinct the strangers ceremonies. ries: and the ambaffadors of PERSIA having caused the temple of Jupiter Olympian to be finished, begun of long time in ATHENS, they ordained that it should be dedicated to the spirit of guftus. Being passed from thence into ${f A}$ s 1 A, he gaue order to his provinces and those of the people of Romerpunished the Cyzicenians, that had killed the Romaine citizens in their town. He imposed a tribute vpon those of Tyre and Sidon, who had dealthadly, and brought them into the forme of a province. He did much good vnto the townes that had bene faithfull vnto the commonwealth: to some of them he gaue the right of Burgesship of Rome, and to others the fame rights and priviledges which the naturall citizens of Rome had. He built up agains the cities of LAODICEA, and of THIATIRA: he set them vp of the Isle of CHIO againe, afflicted before by an earthquake; he did exempt them from all subsidies for fixe yeares. He restored certaine Realmes vnto their kings whom he had subdued; or else he did establish others ancw, who came to attend him at his Court as subjects, without any signes or tokens of royall dignity. He fent Tiberius into ARMENIA, to install Tigranes vnto his royall throne againe, having bene Phraates king of the PARTHIANS being afraid they would fet voon him, was very carefull to get all the Romain's together, which were taken after the ouerthrow of Crassus and Antonius; whom he sent every man of them vnto Augustus with all the standards and enfignes, and also his some and nephewes for pledges of his faithfull friendship vnto the people of Rome. Augustus granted him peace, and then he came into the Ile of Samos, comforted RHODES, replenished CORINTH and PATRAS with a great number of men enfranchised, whom he made Burgesses of Rome. In this place also there came vnto him embassadors from Porus and Pandion, two of the mightiest kings of the Indians, who prayed alliance and friendship with him, and brought him very rare presents. There came with them a Philosopher of India called Zarmanus: who being brought to the city of ATHEMS, burnt himselfe aliue, as one Calamus did in the time of Alexander the Great.

In this meane space the city of Rome was full of great trouble by the practises of Egnating Rufus, who by force would needs be chosen Consult in Augustus place being absent: who gaue not him his voice, but named Lucretius Vefpillo, escaped from the proscription, as hath bene spoken of before. But this put him in such a rage, that he conspired with M. Genucius, and Plautius Rufus to kill Augustus. But they being discoucred betimes, were imprisoned and executed by decree of the Senate: who made infinite numbers of honours vnto Augustus at his returne: howbeit he would not accept them all, but caried himselfe very modestly in every place where he was. The people chofe him Cenfor for fine yeares, and perpetual! Confull: and at his request they granted triumph vnto Cornelius Balbus, although he were no Romaine borne (for he was a Spaniar b) by reason of his notable victories he had obtained, as Lieutenant of Augustus. vpon the GARAMANTES. Agrippa on the other fide was fent into GAVLE troubled by the inuafions of the Germains, whom he ordered well enough. Then he led his army into Spaine, troubled with the rebellion of the Cantaerians: the which came thus to passe. The priand Spaine. foners Cantabrians whom they had fold by the drumme, by a complot they made together, cut their mafters throates, and then fled into their country, where they follicited others to takearmes, got their fortreffes into their hands, and fet vpon the Romaine garrifons, Agrippa could by no meanes bring his fouldiers thither, whether that they defired to take reft, or that the resolution of the Cantabrians didastonish them. But after that he had brought them to his hand, he marched directly against the enemies: who had the better at the first encounter, and the ROMAINES were well beaten. But they being rebuked and punished by Agrippa, who gaue' them barley for wheat, he returned again to fight. But then the CANTABRIANS that bare armes were all cut in peeces, the rest disarmed, and drawne from the mountaine to dwell in the plaine. Augustus was faluted Emperour or soucraigne Captaine, because of this victory: but Agrippa modeftly refused triumph, and within a while after he overcame the PANNONIANS also. The yeare following, the Gete sand Daces being at civill warres, Lentulus that had subdued them before counselled Augustus not to lose this occasion; for he might easily subdue these barbarous people being thus deuided. But Augustus not being of the mind to make any warres at all with any nation, without great and iust cause, (although there were more hope of gaine, then apparance of losse,) he answered: There was no cause for him to do so: adding also, that those that fought a litlegaine with great loffe and danger, were like vnto those that would angle with a golden hooke, the which breaking and falling into the water, no fish is worth the value of it. And therefore that the barbarous were to be left to their own miseries: and that by their bloodshed, by their owne companions, they were more then enough punished for the illes they had done to the ROMAINES, who ought not to begin first to do euill.

In the same yeare Augustus being very desirous to put his hand to the reformation of abuses in Rome, and that effectually, he joyned with him his nephew Agrippa in the state of a Cenfor, and did establish him Tribune for five yeares. First of all he began to correct some diforders that were in the Senate, he reformed the knights, spectacles, and playes, and the maner of futes for publik offices. He set fines vpon their heads that would not marrie, and bestowed much vpon them that had wives & children. He gave vnto Hortensius Hortalius five and twenty thoufand crownes, to procure him to take a wife, that he might raife vp iffue to that noble house and familie of the Horsenses. He ordained also that maidens should be twelve yeares old at the least before they maried, and fuffered them to kill adulterers taken with the fact, without punishment condemcondemning the Sodomites without remission. And for military discipline, he looked yery carefully vnto that. And because a knight of Rome had cut off his owne some shombes, for that he should not go to the warre, he made him to be fold by the drumme, and all his goods. Remains But because the regrators were greedy to seize upon them, he made them ceasse the sale, and put knightfor the knight into the hands of one of his bondmen enfranchifed, and was contented to drive him his four. out of Rome. Furthermore he procured that the Senate should not be kept but with great renerence: that the Senators should come together as into a temple of deuotion; and that no decree should passe, but in the presence of 400 Senators, if it might be that no man should be made free of Rome, but vpongreat confideration. For the rest, he and Agrippa gaue the people the pleafure of fecular yearely games, which had not bene feene an hundred yeares before. But he tooke very great care that there should no insolencies be committed. He punished the players indiners forts, that behaued themselues more licentiously then became them. And when one of them amongst them called him Lord, he shewed the people with his voice, his eyes, and his hand, that hewas not well pleafed withall: and the next morning he published a sharpe Edict, forbidding all persons expresly to say so, and would neuer suffer that any of his should give him this name. But these playes being ended, he adopted Caius and Lucius the Jonnes of Agrippa. In all this great busines, y SICAMERES, VSIPETES, & TENCHTERES, people of GERMANIE, surprised certain ROMAINS in their territory, hanged them vp, paffed ouer the Rhein, spoiled Gavis, ouerthrew certaine horsemen, and following their purpose, ouercame M. Lollius Proconsull of GAVLE, and tookeaway an enfigne from him. Yet though he were a man of small action and very couetous: neuertheleffe he was reuenged of them, and coming vpon the inuaders, fought with them, and Disertedraue them beyond the Rhein. On the other fide, C. Lentulus made war with the Dac Bs, & kil- bels fubduled three of their chief leaders with a great number of men; and afterwards he established a garrison by the river of Danuby, to stop the incursions of this wild nation. Augustus seeing these troubles, disposed of the affaires of ITALY to go into GAVLE, to rid himselfe of these griefes, andby his absence to make his presence more honorable. At that same time, diners people inhabiting vpon the river of Danuby, rebelled : but Augustus Lieutenants bestirred them so well, that they were all compelled to seeke peace. At that time also all GAVLE was in commotion, & that indiuers forts. But the couerous fest of Licinius Enceladus, made free, and soliciter of the affaires of Magnetics, was cause of all this mischiefe. For he having companded the reachest confines of Augustus, was cause of all this mischiefe. For he having commanded the people to furnish the tribute for every moneth, he had put fourteene moneths in the years for twelve. So be- his stener ing accused to his master for money ill gotten, although all the world cryed out of him, yethe found the meanes to escape well enough. For after he had gotten an infinite maffe of gold and ilis. filter together, he brought it to Augustus, saying, he had never other intention but to take from the GAVLES the meanes to rebell. For all this Augustus withdrew him from thence, and sent Tiberius thither to settle all things in good estate againe. Almost during these commotions, and outragious diffentions, the RHETIANS, neare vnto the lake of Come, brake into GAVLE CISALPINE, and tooke out of ITALY store of bootic. They were a people separated from all others, and fo cruell, that having taken any place from the ROMAINES, they killed all the male children, and further, did aske their foothfayers of women with child: and if they faid she was great with a boy, they presently ran her through, and killed her and the fruit of her wombe. Au- Druss sent gustus would not endure these outrages, but sent Drusus the sonne of Liuia against them: who drauethem out of ITALY, having ouercome them in a fet battell, neare vnto TRENT. They commends fay that their women shewed themselves so cruell in this fight, that their darts failing them, the trail they tooke their litle children by their legges, and did most barbarously force themselues to fmite their enemies in the face. Those that were driven out of ITALY would have entred into GAVLE, but they were repulfed by Tiberius. In the end, these people and their allies were conftrained to submit themselves.

Angustus sent a Colonie vnto NISMES in LANGVEDOCKE: and made them free Burgesses of Rome. It is thought that he fent another vnto ARLES, of the fixt legion: and one of the fecond VIIto ORANGE. Some make report of these Colonies in the time of Tiberius M. Agrippa on the other fide, he gaue order for the affaires of As IA, and of all the Orient, where he behaued himfelf fowell, that all that were friends to the people of Rome, were of better courage then before, & all their enemies fo valiantly suppressed, that Augustus was faluted the tenth time soueraign captaine. But Agrippa after his wonted maner, would have no triumph: which was the cause of the loffe of this custome, and others following his example, were contented from thenceforth with the ornaments of triumph. But of another fide, the PANNONIANS, the GENOVESES, and those of PIEMONT rebelling, they were subdued by the Lieutenants of Augustus: who builded two cities in testimony of his victorie against these two last people whereof Tyrin (called Augusta

Augustus having pacified GAVLE, stayed the invasions of the GERMANES, and quenched the rebellion of Spaine: he left Drusus with authority and his army vpon the Rheine, and came to ROMB as Agrippa did out of As I A, and became extremely ficke of the gowt. Letidus died at the same time, to whom Augustus succeeded in the estate of chiefe Bishop, and made fumptuous spectacles and fights vnto the people. He burnt all the bookes of diumation and prophecie, except those of the Sibylles and yet he kept them not all. He reformed the Kalender, and ordained that there should be no leape yeares for twelue yeares following. He suffered that the fixt moneth then called Sextilis, should be called Angultus after his name. All that yeare was fpent in plaies and pastimes, saving that Augustus (having bene ficke) caused all that he had done in his government to be rehearfed before the Senate. He tooke a review of the Senators, and confirmed his nephew Agrippa in the estate of a Tribune for five yeers more. But shortly after, this great person being returned from a journy out of PANNONIA, whither he was gone to preuent diforders that were likely to be renewed, he fell ficke and died, before Augustus could come in time. That was a maruellous griefe vnto him : and not knowing now on whom he should beflow his daughter Inlia, in the end he chose Tiberius his wives sonne, and maried them together: but they continued not long in good termes together. From thenceforth Tiberius and Drulus dealt almost in all the affaires of warre, and Tiberius especially after the death of the other: of whom we shall speake to best purpose in the life of Tiberius, yet we will briefly note it here. So then Tiberins went and made warre in Pannonia, risen by meanes of the death of Agrippa: yet he made an end of it, killed fome of them, fold and subjected the rest; and compelled all that people to submit themselves vnto the people of Rome. Drusus on the other side made warrein high and low Almaine, and brought the most part of these nations vnto some reason and afterwards he returned to Rome; where Augustus held so straight a hand to bring the Senate to order, that there were few men defired to be of the Senate, and many to the contrary that gauge yo their offices. But Augustus compelled those that were of age, of quality and sufficiencie, and gaue order also that the dignity of the Tribunes of the people should remaine entire: suffering those notwithstanding which had this office, their time expired, to be amongst the Senators, or with knights. As for the townes of As IA afflicted with the earthquake, he payed of his owne to the commonwealth, the yearely tribute which they ought. And for the regard of those which were of his Prouinces, he freed them from all impostes for fixe yeares, and gauethem of PALES-TINE a great quantity of corne, which fuftained great want and famine. In the meanetime Drufus paffed our the Rhein, made warre with the Vsipites, Sicambrians, Tenchteres, Cattians, Chervsians, and Svaveians, whom he ouerthrew in diversencounters: and especially in a great battell, where were killed a very great number. For these people were gathered together with such a confidence of victory, that they had already made agreement among themselves for division of the bootie. But specially at the last battell, the Cherystans should have the horse, the Svavbians they should have the baggage, and the Sicambrians the prisoners. And yet to bind themselues more straightly together, they burnt 20. Centeners of the Romaines. And this was the cause that the battel was so long & cruelly sought betwixt them: yet in the end the victory remained to Drufus, who gaue the prisoners and all the booty to the fouldiers, making the horse, baggage, and captines to be sold to them that would offer most. All the field for a great league & a halfe of length was strewed with dead bodies, and they found in the enemies campe great flore of iron chains prepared by the for the Romains: howbeit they ferued for them. Drufus fet vp a token of triumph, & was called Imperator of his troups in the field where the battell was pitched. Afterwards he built aboue fifty castles ypon the rivers of Meuse, Visturge, and of the Rhein. Tiberius on the other side was in DALMATIA, where he brought them vnder that rofe in armes against them. The triumph of Quatio was decreed to them both, and Augustus was saluted by the Senate Imperator or soueraigne Captaine, and this for the twelfth time. But in these businesses, the warre was hote in Thracia, and more then euer before: all the Prouinces being in rebellion under the conduct of Bulogafes, who had killed the king Rhacuspolis, an allie of the people of Rome, driven out his Uncle and Lieutenant Rhymetalces out of Thracia into Chersonesvs. L. Pife gouernor of Pamphilia went against them, and at the first encounter had not the aduantage, but in the second he ouercame them ytterly. Drusus having made a voyage to Rome, to celebrate the birth day of Augustus in great magnificence, whilest his troupes reposed themselues in their garrisons, about the spring he returned into GERMANIE, ouercame the SVAVBIANS, gaue them a king then he inuaded the countrie of the MARCOMANNES, fought with them diverstimes, killed a great number of them, and made all the rest subject to the Romaines. Because of this victorie, and of that of Piso, Augustus was called Imperator the thirteenth time. Almost in this time he put Proculus to death in prison, one Proculus that he loued best of all his bondmen made free: being convinced of many adulteries. He made an adultethe thighes of his Secretary Thallus to be broken, for the fumme of an hundred crownes which death by he tooke for shewing a secret letter. In this meane time Tiberius continued warre in DALMA- Augustus. TIA and PANNONIA, moued through the great imposts, whereof the people complained: but niled for in the end he subdued them, and built many castles vpon the river of Danuby to stay the inuasions of the enemies. Pife also in Thracia overcame the Mæsians, and Bastarnes, and foreit of brought away a great number of prisoners, who bit their iron chaines for anger, and most impatiently did beare their seruitude. Drusus made the Cattians subject also, then he came to LYONS to meet with Augustus: from whence they both returned together into ITALIE. They hada custome also that yearely on the first day of Ianuarie, (though Augustus were absent) all the Senatours: officers of iustice, and others of meane estate, brought him New-yeares gifts to the Capitoll: and also every one cast a peece of gold or silver into the lake Curtius, for avow that they had made to his health. He did bestow all these New-yeares gifts to buy many rich statues of the gods, which he servp in all the crosse streets.

In the fine and thirtieth yeare of his principalitie, under the Confulate of Drusus Nero, and of Quintus Crispinus, Drusus having subdued a great part of GERMANIE, and preparing to go further, a vision having the shape of a great woman, that spake bigger and louder then a mans voice could do, said to him in Latine: Go no further: which was a signe of his death, the which fol- Drussia di lowed incontinently after. This young Nobleman of an excellent hope, being but thirty yeares ab. in old, Augustus had put him in the roll of his heires, and made an oration in his praise. Afterwards Tiberius all the charge of the warres of GERMANIE was committed vnto Tiberius. And for Augustus, he succeedeib being the same year called for a witnesse in certaine causes, did patiently suffer any man to aske three him, or refuse him, as he had oftentimes done before. One day as he spake in full Senate, one of wars. the Senators told him: I vnderstood nothing: another, I would speake against it, if I might be heard. Another time being wearie with the contestations of certaine pleaders, he went in cholerout of his Seate. But some began to say vnto him, that it was lawfull for Senators to speake freely to any matter that came before them: and that no man was euer offended for the replies or contestations of any man.

Nonius Asprenas, one of his greatest friends, was accused by Cassius Senerus to have poisoned an hundred and thirty bidden guefts at a banquet. Augustus did not recommend him, but let the Senatours alone, who banished cassius. An old fouldier vpon complaint being brought beforethe Senatours, and in danger of his life, befought Augustus to helpe him. And when he had given him an advocate to defend him, the fouldier opened his breast, and shewing him the markes of the wounds which he had received in the battell of Activm, faid vnto him: But I befeech thee Augustus, consider that I have received these wounds here vpon my bodie for to defend thee, and would put no other in my place. Augustus moued with these words, appeared in instice, and pleaded this mans cause, the which he wanne. Soone after he was saluted sour- pleadeth raigne Captaine for the fourteenth time; because of the victories which Tiberius and Sextus A- the cause of puleisse had obtained in Germanie, and in Italie. And the authoritie which had benegite the him forten yeares ouer the state of the Commonwealth being expired, was continued vnto that defermine the state of the Commonwealth being expired. him for ten yeares following. Then he did greatly inlarge the bounds of the territorie of Rome, and having advanced Salustius Crispus (the son of the Historian) vnto the place which Macenas held, the ROMANE knight, his faithfull friend and principall Counseller, deceased in those daies: and by Tiberius continued to bring the GERMAINES vinder: for the victorie of whom, and also for that he had subdued all the people inhabiting alongst the Alpes, the Senate had set vp a token of triumph, and granted triumph to Tiberius.

two young Princes (and because he would have the Romain e a little long for him) he demanded and obtained leave with extremitie, threatning to kill himfelfe with famine, if they did not graunt him: and so went to studie at RHODES. In the meane time Augustus provided for the affaires of Istria, deuided Italie into cleuen Prouinces: and because he doubted they didenuie his greatnesse, he chose nine Pretorian cohorts for his guard, of the which he kept three of them in Rome, lodged here and there in houses, so long as they were in their quarter: and the fixe others were quartered in the next villages vnto it. He also crected new offices, to impart to fo many men more the honours and charges of the Commonwealth. At the same time when before the Senate they did object many crimes ynto Aimilius Ælianus', and amongst other things that he spake ill of Augustus; he turning to the accuser, said vnto him as in choler: Proue me that, and I will make Alianus know that I have a tongue: for I will fay more of him then he hath spoken of me. He made no further inquirie afterwards, and shewed himselfe very gentle and courteous also vnto Casius of Padva, a man of a meane estate: who having spoken openly at a table, that he lacked no good will nor courage to kill Augustus: he contented himselfe to impose this onely punishment vpon him, as to drive him out of Rome. From his eleuenth Confulship vnto the twelfth, there passed seuenteene yeares: all which time he diuerse times had refused his charge: but now he demaunded it, and obtained it. His intention was to aduance caius his litle fonne to great dignitie, whom he caufed to be proclaimed, young Prince, and fent him to see the provinces and armies, in the title of a Proconfull. Then he commaunded him to go into Asia, having given him for governours Lollins and Sulpitias Quirinus. He himfelfe in the meane time remained at Rome, where he established extraordinaric guards, under colour to keepe theeues and maisterlesse men from offering violence, whilest the armies abroad were farre off. The yeare following, Caius having travelled in divers parts of the Orient, made peace with Phraates king of the PARTHIANS, and brought away hostages for affurance thereof, the kings three brethren, and all the Princes of the bloud. The which was practifed by the meanes of the Queene Thermufa, borne in ITALIE, who being fentby Auguflus for a gift vnto Phraates, he fell so in loue with her, and held her in such high estimation, that after the had brought him a fonne called Phraataces, he received her for his lawfull wife. She being defirous her Ionne should possesse the Crowne, draue the right heires farre off by meanes of this peace. And at the end of certaineyeares, Phraataces who entertained it, killed his father, and possessed the kingdome. But he was not long in quiet possession, for the great Lords conspired against him, and tooke from him his life and Crowne together. Furthermore,

Under the fecond Confulate of Claudius Nero, and of Calphurnius Pifo, Caius and Lucius the yong formes of Angustus, were called yong Princes, and appointed Confuls, although they were but of tender yeares, and under fourteene yeares old. This pleased Augustus greatly, though he fained to take no pleasure in it. Furthermore, he then made an edict touching flaunderous libels. declaring who should have the hearing of those crimes, and how they should be punished: al. though he himselfe cared not much, and patiently suffered they should gibe at him, contented mous tibeli to answer by open de fence, vnto the reproches and mockeries they made of him. They fearteredabroad one day in the pallace many bils of paper of cruell iniuries against him. This motied him not at all, neither did he trouble himself much to answer it; but in flead of fearching it out he did adule that hereafter they should have an eye voon those, that by little bookes or Epigrams published (vnder false names) scandale against any man. Tiberius wrote a round letter to him one day, to the end he should carie a straighter hand upon that: but he sent him these words: I pray thee, my friend, let not thy youth ouerrule thee in this matter, nor be not fo hore though I be euill spoken of by some. It is enough if we gaine this point, that no man can hurt vs. Afterwards he deuided the citie of Rome into fourteene regions, and two hundred and ten freets and in enery of them he established Officers to see that all things should be maintain ned as they ought to be, and to report vnto the Prince any memorable thing that should happen. He provided for the violence of fire, he built vp the temples that were burnt or ruined by times and gaue at one time vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitoline, for the renewing of the fame, fixteene thousand pounds of gold, and of rich and costly pearles, to the summe of rivelue hundred thousand fand Crownes.

CESAR AVGVSTVS Caius conquered Armenia, and shortly after Augustus demanded the thirteenth Consulthing to the end to aduance his little fonne Lucius as he had done Caius. He fent him Proconfull into SPAINE, but he fell ficke by the way, and stayed almost a yeare at MARSEILLES. Though these two brethren were farre enough off Tiberius, who kept himselfe as a simple scholer at RHODES, vet they loued not him greatly, nor he them: for which purpose, the processe served not much against their mother Iulia, banished because of her adulteries into the Isle of PANDATA- Iulia the elder RIE. Shortly after, her daughter also called Iulia, married vinto Lucius Paulus, was also conuin and on the condition and on the condition and on the condition and the condit ced of the same crime that her mother was : and was banished into another Isle of the sea Adria- nesse was agreed ticke, called TREMERA. The yeare following, to stay the violent course of great vsuries, and to raise vp againe many families decayed, he put into the Exchange two millions and a halse of gold: that is to fay, fine and twenty hundred thousand crownes, and suffered prinate men to take of it for three yeares without interest, putting in pawne into the Exchequer, lands and possessing in the Exchequer in

Shortly after, Lucius Cosar being 16. yeares of age, dyed at MARSEILLES: which was the canse that Tiberius being reconciled for some other occasion with Cains, he obtained leaue to return from Rhodes to Rome, with condition (for fo was Caius will) that he should meddle with no affaires of estate, and that he should remaine yet the rest of the yeare at Rhodes. As touching Augustus, he laboured to recreate himfelfe with his friends, and did willingly fee learned men, and amongst others, T. Linius that renowned Historian; the Poets, Virgil and Horace, but especially Virgil, who was one of his most sethlesined men familiar friends. Which maketh men thinke that Ouid committed some great fault, since he was abanished man so long, and that he could obtain no grace, though the greatest men were suters for him. And yet the Historians fay, Augustus was not angrie, as appeareth by the fact of Timagenes the Historian, who having differfed abroad some pleasant by-names against Augustus, Liuia, and their familiars, whereat every one of them laughed, it was fo pleafant an encounter,

Augustus was contented to aduise him to moderate his tongue from thenceforth, and did onely forbid him his house and familiaritie, suffering him to waxe old in the company of Asinius Pollio. Hedid greatly support some also that were accused to have sealed a false Will, and mingled with the markes of condemnation and absolution a third, pardoning all those that it should seeme had through ignorance finned in this fact. One being euidently conuinced to have killed his father, was euen at the point to be sewed vp in a leather sacke, according to the custome, and throwne into the sea: but Augustus desirous this cursed wretch should not be thus handled, put the answer in his mouth, in faying vnto him: Surely I beleeve thou hast not killed thy father. The sonne of Tarius being charged to have conspired against the life of his father, Augustus was sent for into

Tarius house, to counsell him what were best to be done; he gaue the father counsell to banish him farre off from all knowledge. And when Tarius would have made Augustus his heire, he refused it, and ordained that the sonne should be banished vnto Marsellles, and that during his fathers life he should have a pension to maintaine him withall.

In the 44 yeare of the monarchie of Augustus, Tiberius having bene absent the space of eight Tiberius return yeares, he came againe to Rome, where he lived, and medled with no matters. But that held not not be Rome, & long: for in the same yeare Caius, vpon whom Augustus principally looked, died in Lycia: and some say, that Livia knew well enough of what death: for the greatly defired the advancement

whom he knew better then any other, and neuer spake any thing well, but he spied alwaies some crosse thing in him of a dangerous nature he had. And yet some judge, that Angustus did repute the vertues in Tiberus to be greater then his imperfections, confidering also that in the Oration he made, his words tended to this end, that he adopted Tiberius in fauor of the commonwealth. But before he would declare this adoption, he compelled Tiberius to adopt his nephew Germa. picus the son of Drusus, and he adopted with Tiberius Agrippa Posthumus, the son of M. Agrippa Then to prevent the complots of some of the chiefest of Rome, he made Tiberius to be chosen Tribune for ten yeares following. That was the cause that in Rome they began to speake well of Tiberius, whom they faw by that meanes formwhat stepped into Augustus place, so soone as he should happen to die. Furthermore at the instance of the people of Rome and Tiberius himselfe, Augustus tollerated the banishment of his daughter Iulia: howbeit for no intreatie he would ener renoke her again. So after the decease of Augustus, the was destitute of all helpe, and Tiberius made her die for want in an vnknowne place. The yeare following, Valerius Meffala, and C. Cinns grandchild of the great Pompey, were elected Cofuls. Cinna that tooke part with his cofins, wasta. ken prifoner, & brought to Augustus, who gave him life & advanced him. This notwithstanding, he was afterwards attainted and convinced to have conspired against the life of Augustus whom through the counsell of Livia he sent for into his chamber, & gently rebuked him for all the good augustus by his deeds he had done to him: pardoned him this last offence, & afterwards raised him to the dignity of a Confull, being fory that he durst not demand it. After that, cinna became his faithfull friend and feruant, & bequeathed all his goods by will vnto Angustus, against whom never any man cofoired more. His Lieutenants in Africk obtained some victories, & Tiberius continued the war in GERMANIE, from whence he oftentimes returned to Rome to keepe himself in Augustus good fauor. Who having limited the pay, recompence, commoditie, and time that the foldiers should haue, he procured for fome time the good of the commonwealth, which had continued longer in prosperitie, if his successors had better entertained militarie discipline. Afterwards to resist the mutinies of the people by reason of famine, he established corps de guard in all the places of ROME, and draue out a multitude of vnprofitable mouthes. And when come came agains to the ordinary price, he was about to abolish the distribution of corne which the commonwealth made: because that the people trusting vnto that, made no reckoning to plow their lands. At the same time many towns in diverse Provinces were inclined to rebel, which caused the Senate to make a decree, that the governors of Provinces should command two years one after another, and should not depart thence till their successour were arrived. The ILLYRIANS also began to rife, but they were supprest immediatly by Valerius Messalinus. For Germany, all were subject vnder the name of the Romanes, except the Marcomannes, and their king Maroboduus, a valiant and wife man, that kept himselfe and his people in good discipline, having alwayes an army readie of threescore and ten thousand footmen, and foure thousand horse, all the which he traisned and put in readinesse against his neighbours, to defend him the better against the Ro-MANES, if they came to affaile him. Tiberius prepared himselfe with twelue legions to make warre with him, but being constrained to go against the ILLYRIANS, he made agreement with Maroboduus, that fought peace and quietnesse, and so marched where necessitie called him. For the ILLYRIANS, to the number of eight hundred thousand men and vpwards, rose in manner all at an inftant, and mustered up in short time, with such order in their affaires and warlike exploits, that they possess and brought in subiection almost all Macedon, and put Augustus into a maruellous perplexitie, because they prepared themselues to come into ITA. EIE. Hercupon Tiberius is chosen to go against them, the which he did with so good direction and warlike judgement, that he dispersed their armie. But now concerning the countrey of THRACIA, there the armie of the ROMANES was put to flight: yet taking heart againe, they returned to meet with their enemics, and obtained an honourable victorie. For which cause they called Augustus Imperator or soueraigne Captaine the fixteenth time. The ILLYRIANS made head againe better then before under the conduct of Bato Desidiates, they made violent and strange inualions.

iniafions, and Tiberius neuer came against them. Whereupon Augustus conceiuing an euill opinion, dispatched Germanicus the sonne of Drusus, to go into ILLYRIA with a compleate armie. On the other side Agrippa Posthumus shewed himselfe so insolent, and committed so many fol-On the other fide Agrippa rojumum file weet mind therefore he disanowed & disinherited him, Agrippa lies, that Augustus could no longer endure them, and therefore he disanowed & disinherited him, Possibusus confiscated his goods, and confined him to SVRRENTVM: where being more audacious then befor his following for the following for his following following for his following for his following followin to make an ordinance that he should remaine there till his death. By this meanes every man be- foliusias, gan to regard Tiberius, who was also declared the fon and colleague of Augustus by decree of the Senate, who committed vnto him all the armies and provinces of the Empire. Linia his mother did helpe him greatly in all these affaires. Furthermore he would not stirre out of ILLYRIA vnill he had made an end of this warre, which continued three whole yeares.

Now at the arrival of Germanicus, the cheftaines of the ILLYRIANS came fuddenly to affaile Germanithe camp of the Romaines: who faining to be afraid, staid till the enemy came to charge them our overmdisorder. Then they came out with furie against them, killed a great number of them, and made the ally ridges therest to flie. By reason whereof they gave Augustus the name of Imperator the eighteenth time. Bato Distillates came to salute Tiberius set in his tribunall chaire, without holding downe his head, or my way imbasing himselfe; and being asked why after so many battles lost, he did yet rebell againe: he answered boldly againe, that the ROMAINES were the cause of it: who in stead of oppressors hepheards had sent them wolves to keepe their flocke. Peace was granted vnto the DALMA- rebellion. TIAN'S vpon certaine conditions. And as for the BREVCIANS which continued their warre. they were ouerthrowne in many encounters, and at the length brought to subjection by Plan. imssiluauus, who triumphed. Their king Bato Beucrus had betrayed and delinered vnto the Ro-MAIN'S another great Captaine of the IL tyrian's called Pinnetes: and afterwards he was deluered himselfe by his owne men vnto Bato Desidiates, who killed him with his owne hand: and then fortified himselfe in DALMATIA, where having made head almost a yeare and a halfe against the armies of Tiberius and Germanicus, he won and lost many battels: at the lift, being able to hold out no longer, he fent his fonne to demaund peace of Tiberius, promiing to yeeld himselfeand his into the hands of Augustus. He obtained safe conduct, and came by night vnto Tiberius campe: who gaue him very gracious entertainment, and many rich preents. Afterwards he made him be brought to RAVENNA, and was also gently vsed, because that man encounter where he was inclosed, and in danger of his life, he had given him meanes to chape and faue himselfe. And because of the divers victories obtained by Germanicus and Tibeius, Augustus was faluted for the nineteenth & twentieth time Imperator or sourraigne Captaine. And for the PANNONIANS, their young menthat had so many times threatned ITALIE, were constrained to bring all their armes together on a heape, as they were commanded, and to fall on their knees before Tiberius to demand peace of him. He received them into grace, and fent them home to their houses, disposing his garrisons in strong places, vnder the charge of Mar. un Lepidus. The glory of Tiberius was yet more noble, and the anguishes of Augustus increaled by the ouerthrow of Quintilius Varns: who being gone to affaile Arminius Prince of the Quintilius CHERVSSIANS, was enclosed in marishes, and vtterly ouerthrowne with three Romaine legi- werthrown. onsthat were flaine in the place and for himselse, searing to fall aliue into the hands of the Care-MYSSIANS, he killed himselfe with his owne hand. The victors did neuer so cruelly handle the ROMAINES as those whom they might know were common Counsellers and pleaders. for at the beginning when Varus came to commaund their countrey, where they knew not what processe meant, he perswaded himselfe he should tame them well enough, ving the same forme and order of processe there amongst them, as they did at ROME. So lie had a judgement feate, and all matters were pleaded before him. Some of them amongst the rest being very subill, seemed to esteeme much this pleading; and to bring him asseepe, they of purpose moved occasion of processe and suite one against the other and then they went before him, and by Ro-MAINES themselves whose tongues they borrowed, they demanded instice. Then they reloyced not a little when they could catch any of these Counsellers: for they put out the eyes of counsellers one of them, cut off the hands of others of them; and they say, that they cut out the tongue of handled by a lone, and afterwards sewed vp his mouth, and he that held the tongue in his hand, said vnto him:

O viper, at the last yet thou wilt leave whistling. Augustus was so astonied at this losse, that ar times he would beat his head against the wall, crying out, Varus, give me my legions. Certaine yeares after. Germanicus buried the bones of the Romaines that were killed in this ouerthrow The yeare following Tiberius returned into GERMANIE, and to keepe the passages of the Rhein Angustus served his turne with the flaues enfranchised, which caused afterwards great confusons and seditions in the ROMAINE armie. In all these stirs, two men of no worth, called Anda. and Epica- fins and Epicadus, complotted to take away Inlia the daughter of Augustus, and Agrippa Posthu. dus feeking mus from the places where they were, and to bring them to some legions, to alter the estate. But they were foone discouered, and punished for their rashnesse. Some others also committed the like fond enterprises, but they vanished away without any effect.

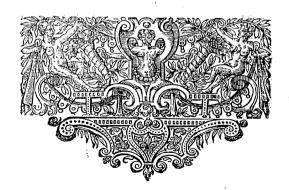

Furthermore, Augustus being now old and broken, began to leaue all great companies, cassiered his guards, and fent them to garrifons farre off, to the end they should not go about to make bis afts in any change. He gaue commandement that the GAVLES and GERMAINES should depart the city by a day prefixed. In the meane time Tiberius having devided his armie into four parts, entredinto Germany, about fine &twenty leagues into the country beyond the Rhein, & putall to fire and bloud: then he retired fearing some encounter of Varus. Touching Augustus, he qualified some strict lawes against the vnmaried, the gifts of the husband to the wife, the banquets and fuits:he did forbid the Divines to answer the vaine question of those, that would know how long they should live; and he suffered the knights (if they were challenged) to fight at the sharp. Germanicus being returned to Rome, obtained the Confulship, and Tiberius triumphed of the ILLYRIANS, PANNONIANS, DALM ATIANS, and GERMAINES: followed with his Licutenant Germanicus, Vibius Posthumus, Plautius Siluanus, and Marcus Lepidus, with triumphing robes. But before he went vp to the Capitoll, he went out of his charret, and fell downe on his knees before Augustus. Then he made a dinner for all the people, and had a thousand tables set up for them, and gaue to every one of them seven crownes and a halfe. Under the Consulhip of C.silius, and of Munatius Planeus, Augustus having obtained ten yeares with Tiberius to provide for the affaires of the commonwealth: to the end to quench many falle rumors, about fixteene moneths before his death, he made his will, and gaue it to the Uestals virgins to keepe. Because his ficknesse kept him from coming to the Senate, he prayed the Senators to think of some means to entertaine the men of warre. Which they having well confidered, found no better meanes then that which he himselfe had found out to wit of the twentieth part of the inheritances and they all agreed vnto it. The next yeare following, he went (as they fay) to fee Agrippa in his Isle of Plans 11, the which troubled Lina much, for the knew what was past. At the same time he and Tiberius tooke muster of the ROMAINE citizens, and shortly after he fell sick, wherof they recite many causes. But thereupon he went into the country vnto some places of pleasure, where he mended a litle, and passed the time away pretily merric, carying Tiberius with him, whom he would have brought on his way to BENEVENT, from whence he went into ILL YRIA. At his returne his ficknesse increased, that he was faine to stay at Noin, and sent for Tiberius and talked with him a long time very privately, and after that did neuer any thing of importance: although the Historians do not agree whether Tiberius was come before his departure or not. For Lina had fet spials in the house he lay fick in, and on the high waies, giving it out abroad that Angustus was well & on the other fide fending messages vpon messages vnto Tiberius, same spreading it abroad that Augustus was dead, & that Tiberius held his place. Augustus being at the point to give up the ghost, made himself to be combed, and speaking to his friends, asked if no body made any noise without. So he exhorted them to rejoyce with him, for that he had so happily plaied the Comedy of this humane life. Then having fent them all out of his chamber, he asked if Li. nia Drufus daughter were in health and fo embracing his wife, faid thefe words vnto her. Farewell Linia, behave thy felfe well, and remember our mariage; and fuddenly went away, making a fweet end, which he alwaies defired as often as he heard talk of those that died quietly. He died in the fame towns, and in the fame chamber that his father Octavius died in, and lived neare vnto the age of threefcore and fixteen yeares. His corps being brought to Rome, the Uestall virgins brought out his will and testament, by the which he appointed Tiberius his heire, and gaue him three parts of his goods, and his wife Linia the fourth part. Furthermore he gaue to the people of Rom a twelue hundred and fifty thousand crowness to the fine and thirty Tribes, thi recene hundred feuen and thirty thousand, flue hundred crowness to enery one of the Pretorian souldiers 25 crownes, to those of the towne 12 crownes and a halfe. There were other legacies to be paid within a yeare, and he faid, that all his legacies performed, he left his heires foure millions of gold. Within 20 yeares before his death, he did inherit of his friends goods which had made him their heire, about 35 millions of gold: howbeit that he had spent all that, with two patrimonies of his owne, for maintenance of the commonwealth. With his testament there were three little libels or codicils, the owne shewing what he would have done at his funerals. The fecond was a brief of all his actions, which he commanded should be grauen in copper tables before his tombe. The third contained the state of his revenew, and of the principall affaires of the Empire. He had added to them also the names of the enfranchised bondmen and of the slaves. whom they might bring to account, and therewith he aduised them to keepe the limites of the Empire which they had at that time. They caried him with great pomp into the field of Mars, where he was reduced into ashes, which they closed vp in his sepulcher built in his fixt Confulhip, after all these ceremonies the Senate appointed him a temple & divine honors, and he was placed in ranke with the gods. To make his honour yet greater, one Numerius Atticus that had bene Prætor, a man of great authority in Rome, was entifed by Liuia, who gaue him five and twenty thousand crownes, to sweare before all the people, that he saw Augustus caried vp into heauen. After his death, many speeches were diverfly spoken of his life; some reproving him, Divers pee. as much as others commended him. But his fucceffour made him oftentimes to be lamented. of Augustus And so he was wont to say of Tiberius, that he should leave to the Romaines in succession of after hu the Empire, a successour that neuer consulted twife of one thing. that it is not possible to be better. But if my two Philosophers (fince I have begun to qualifie them thus) were contented to thut vp themselves in some schoole or studie, and to do nothing elle but declaime and fashion some scholers, it may be indeed I should better have left this enreprise vnto some follower of Diogenes Lacrtius, that would describe the sects of Philosophie. and the principall founders of the fame. Now there are here two personages, which (as the foule within the bodie) have through their notable counfels given motions vnto great and meane men in their time, and by other mens eyes and hands have done infinite things in the focietic of mans life, vnto the which they ferue at this day with their precepts and goodly inflruacions, without the which the exploits of others should be partly buried and abolished, as those haue bene of fo many other men that came before and after. They be the two schoole-maisters and counfellors of two Emperors. They be men that befide their ftudy have borne great and honorable offices, in the which they have so caried themselves, that by their actions a man may gather, that knowledge is a great prop and stay to a vertuous man. If they haue not worne armor and commanded armies: if a man fee them in a long gowne, and their bookes in their hands, they lose not therefore their glory which so many wayes recommendeth them at this present. having lift vp learning in honour, and furnished strong armes, by meanes whereof all Princes may wifely and happily maintaine their effates against the fury of warres, and vnder the quiet

THE LIFE OF Plutarch.

Thy precepts are a crowne of purest gold To Traian deem'd the glory of mankind. In hands, and hearts, if great men would thee hold, Vertue should rule, and vice should go behind.

Auing vndertaken to gather the lives of Plutarch, and of Seneca, as they themselues are amply shewed in their workes, the which in despite of the furie of an infinitie of strange accidents have yet remained whole and in reputation vntill this present time: first, this thought hathposfeffed me before, that fome man may maruell, how, and wherefore I do ioyne Philosophers, quiet men, and friends of solitarinesse, vnto so many noble and worthy warriers. Wherein it feemeth I wander too farre off from the principall intention of Plutarch, who was so willing to honour the Muses, joyning into one body so many members and

With darts, and targets of Mars redoubtable.

But I hope, that if those (which thinke strange of my doings) will but at leisure, with a reposed eye, looke vpon the lives before they shall find that I have not gone so farre from the right meaning, as at the first fight may be judged. For, besides that the lines of some Orators, especially of Demosthenes and of Cicero, are seene amongst the others: you shall find few noblemen represented by our Author, but that they have as carefully handled bookes, as their swords. And if fome feeme to be fo much given to armes, that they have left the ftudy of learning behind them, yet we may fee that they have loued Philosophers, and that they themselves have earnestly and the lines of effectually reasoned of Philosophy, in time of warre and peace. And whereas Plutarch hath mingled some with vertuous men, some (I say) which have done infinite hurt to themselves, Why Plu- and to all the world during their lives, and whose names are detested at this day by those themtach wrote felues which follow their execrable doings: his intention was not to place them in the Theater the lines of fome with of vertue, as if they had deferued it: but as learned painters finely apply cloudy and dark colours ous mena in their tables, to the end that the lively and fresh colours should appeare more beautifull, and as it were imboffed, fo in entermingling the strange excesses of some GREEKEs and ROMAINES

reprefenting men destitute of the knowledge of the true God, with the holy and admirable considerations of the life of them which have bene lightned with the happy and supernatural light. That requireth a whole booke, and feparated from this prefent worke; our purpose being otherwise bent. But as in the former liues I was defirous to waken the good spirits of our nation, and by the interiection of some of my conceipts to induce them to do better. Ido the like also in these two, attending the commoditie to set foorth others, if the author of life do Now before we proceed any further, for as much as Seneca was long time before Plutarch, Win Plutarche longe might also require another order in my discourse. Notwithstanding, as Plutarch doth ordi-fore Seneral. narily place the Greekes before the Romanes, and that for the matter of their lives there is no need otherwise for a man to trouble himselfe much about the disposing of them, and that those which be dead do not quarrell together to know who shall go before or behind, I have thought with my selfe, that I might begin this worke where I thought good, without binding my selfe too curiously, either to the order of time, or to such other circumstances. For if any man be offended, I will alledge that vnto him which was spoken vnto one displeased because his horse was painted standing on his feete, which he would have had lying on his backe and his feete vpward: Turne the other fide vpward, and you shall be pleased. Even so is it in his choise to reade such a life first as he thinketh good, and to turne the table at his pleasure, no man being constrained to come into the closet of the Muses, but at his owne will, and by the gate which pleafeth him beft. I could have bene contented to have offered Plutarch onely, or left him hidden in his workes, the true and durable treasures of his glory: but having benefolicited

As to the contrary, when violence alone would rule, and that men Mithiefer that thought there was no need that our foirits should be kept in and directed by the exhortations of follow the waite Philosophy, confusions came on in heapes, which ruined and overthrew that which they of instruction by Philosophie, to shew some patternes, I was vnwilling to let him go alone. Now, I cannot cast mine eye yoon that personage, but Seneca doth also present himselfe vnto me, for many reports and agreements that are between them. For, besides that nature hath brought them into the world in the reuolution of one age, both came out of a strange countrey to Rome: both of them were rich and of great power, maisters and teachers of two Emperours, which did enrich and aduance them to honour, and great offices in the commonwealth. In regard of their learning, although the The end or feebe one of them was of a feet impugned by the other in diverfer espects, yet they both tended to of the dictrine one end, although it was by diverse wayes, to wit, to drive away vice and vanity out of the hearts of their disciples, and to plant in them the love of vertue, the contempt of death, and of the world, with fo found reasons, and so well combined the one to the other, that it is vnpoffible to enter into a schoole of the heathen better ordered then that of these two, to learne (as we ough) to be ashamed of dishonest things, and to exercise those that be honest and vertuous. But as touching other agreements and diffemblances which may be noted as well in their life and behauiour as in their doctrine, peraduenture it shall be better to reserve it to fitter place, or to leave the discourse vnto the studious readers, who aduisedly considering this little which we presently present vnto them, and joyning thereto the writings of the one and the other, shall know what authority and art these two wife men haue to draw the most ignorant and soolish to the love of vertue. Also that their stile, with their pertinent and plaine manner of discourse, is accompanied with great grauity and forcible reasons, to make men confident to beleeue them. If the one flow fweetly, and almost alwayes maintaineth himselfe in the same: the other in his wandrings and rollings about can well reforme his errours, and come to it againe in time, and then go on better then when he first began. Plutarch vseth a world of approches and hookes to pull downe vice. Seneca feemeth to prouoke him to the combat, and when he fetteth vpon him, it is by taking him by the coller and shaking him in all parts. The one seemeth to be a companie of light horsemen charging very swiftly, and at diverse wheelings and returnes: the other, to a battalion of footmen well fet in order, affailing refolutely, and not remouing out of the place before he have won the victory. The opinions of Plutarch are handled with Platonicall inductions, enriched with examples, with fimilitudes, with quicke fentences, and gracious recitals, which force the reader to yeeld. Seneca drawing that which is praise-worthy from the Stoickes, and from EPICVRVS also goodly instructions, as the Bee finely draweth from the herbe of bitter inyce that which maketh fweet hony, differing formwhat from the common vie, he maketh a very profitable and fure harbor wherein a heart ill fetled may repose it selfe. The one speaketh as a friend, the other as a maister: and both with such a grace, that whether they give good counsell, or that they command, the eares and hearts do bow at their voices. Infomuch that the wicked are constrained in reading of these Philosophers to acknowledge, and plainely to heare within this graue schoole, a million of truths which condemneth them: and I cannot tell with whathidden force (as the Adamant draweth iron) they feele themselves to be carried that way, ynto the which the learned instructions of these two Philosophers do direct them, to delight in themeuen with mourning, and to confesse, that these be the persons of whom men may learne to be leffe victous, and more vertuous. Good men also they gather there as sweete fruite as possible may be, for remedie against so many cruelties of this present life. And although they find their true and perfect contentment in a farre better schoole without comparison, yet so it is, that in this schoole here they understand things which afterwards makes the other more acceptable & more honourable. Now for as much as afterwards we have mixed the memories of their lives with diverse particularities, which will make vs see a part of the comparisons that may be noted betweene them, let vs begin with Plutareh, and confider his life principally by the inftructions which he himselfe hath left, and namely in many places of his Morall and mingled

Paulanias, in the ninth booke of his description of GREECE, faith, that there ran a common rumour abroad among the Thebans, that Cadmus the sonne of Agenor comming from Del-PHES into Phocide, was guided by a cow marked in both her flankes with white spots in forme of a full Moone: and that the Oracle commanded him to flay with his troupes in that place where the cow should lye downe. Which came to passe in the territory afterwards called BOEOTIA because of this cow. At the beginning of the same booke he saith, that BOEOT TIA tooke the same name of mess the sonne of Iton, and of the nymph Menalippe: which should should feeme repugnant. But the one and the other opinion may well agree, if we fay that Cadmus being come into that part of the countrey, Beotius that had a charge in these troupes, and remaining there after the others, left his name to all the territorie which is neare neighbour to ATTICA, but in a thicker aire because it standeth betwixt two mountaines, and that the country is more Northwards. So that the ATHENTANS were ever thinner in body, and of livelier spirit; and the BOETIANS to the contrary, fuller of flesh, and duller of wit also. From whence came many flents of laughter against the masse and weight of their understandings, and they made prouerbes dispersed in Greeke and Latine books. Yea the Poets themselues, and Ebulus among others do flout the Bortians, that they are great feeders, and loue to fpeake much: which agreethvery well with the rest of their maners. Platarch also himselfe in his first treaty of eating offlesh, noteth somewhat of that. Neuerthelesse, of such a countrey came Pelopides, and other excellent men, but namely him of whom we are now prefently to fpeake of, no fimple nor forishman: but as

Midst busies, and the thickest of the thorne The flowers of tendrest violet are borne:

Euen fo out of a countrey accustomed to bring forth fat men, as they fay, and fitter for war then Plutar learning, came Plutarch, borne in the citie of CH ERONEA, neare vinto LEBADIA. In old time come but of (as Paulanias faith)it was called ARNE, because of Arné the daughter of Eolus. But afterwards citie of Babecause it stood euill, and looked towards the West, Charon the son of Apollo, and of There the daughter of Phylas, caused it to be new built, and turned to the East, to make it more wholsome and habitable. Upon which occasion, in token of thankfulnesse for the good act of the founder, it was euer after called CHERONEA. And although for many memorable accidents this towne is noted in histories, yet do I not know any thing that hath fo much kept up the memorie of itvntill this prefent, as the name of Plutarch, whose ancestours, men of a noble race, maintained themselues from father to the sonne in honourable office and place of charge in their little Plutarets commonwealth, untill the time of Nicarchus his great grandfuther, who lived in the time of defent, ex Augustus Casar, as Plutarch reporteth in the life of Antonius: where he faith also, that all the citizens of Cheronea, not one excepted, were compelled them felues to carie voon their shoulders, a certaine measure of corne to the sea coast, which is before the Ile of Anticyre; and yet they were driven forward, whipped with many a fore lash. Againe, as they were preparing for a second iourney, and that every man had his burthen ready, newes came that Antonius had lost the battell before Activm, which faued Cheronea. For Antonius commissioners and fouldiers fled immediatly, and the citizens deuided the corne among fittiem. Nicarchus, amongst other children had Lamprics, a learned man amongst those of his time, and of whom Plutarch maketh often mention in his bookes, where he speaketh of talke at the table: how that he had bene in company with other learned men at many feafts, where there was no talk but of learning and matters of Philosophic. He speaketh also of his father, the sonne of Lamprias, not expressing his name although he representeth him discoursing of many points of Philosophie. and namely in the bookes about mentioned. Of this Philosopher then the some of Lamprias were borne many children, and amongst others Plutarch, Timon, and Lamprics: all which three were very carefully brought up and instructed in the liberallsciences, and in all the parts of Philofophie: vnto the which, they shall euer see an humble reuerence towards their grandfather & father iouned together, and among it them felues a fast and pleasant friendship, as may be gathe- The amuse red in many places out of their table talk. Wherupon in respect of the grandsather and sather, and some of Iremembred that Plutarch in those bookes speaking of his grandfather, he makes alwayes honourable mention of him. And as for his father, in the instruction of those that deale in affaires there. of the estate, he reporteth that he being young was fent with another in embassage to the Proconfull, and his companion remaining vpon fome occasion behind, he went thither alone, and executed the commission. And at his returne, as he would have given the commonwealth account openly, and have made report of his charge and embassage, his father rising vp alone, torbad him to fay, I went, but we went; and I spake, but we spake; and so commanded him to make his report, alwaies toyning his companion with that he had done. We fee in the treatic of brotherly loue, how heartily he loued his brother Timon, when he faid in these words: For my selfe, although fortune hath shewed me many fauours, which deserue that I should be thankfull to her for them, yet there is none that maketh me fo much bound to her as the love and good will my brother Timon hath borne, and doth beare vnto me in all things: the which no man can deny to be true, that hath but a little frequented our company. And in his talke at the table, bringing in his father and brethren with many others, or together, resoluing diverse questions of Philosophy, he representeth menthat with a grounded knowledge had joyned a sweet behauiour, and a wonderfull good vnderstanding, and namely the yong Lamprias, who was of apleafant nature, and loued to be merry. Plutarch then having a father that loued learning and vertue was in a good houre put out to learning, whereunto he was wholly inclined. And amongst other good maisters, he met with Ammonius, an ÆGYPTIAN borne, saith Eunapius, who hauing with great praise taught in ALEXANDRIA, he did also visit the cities of GREECE wherein learning did yet flourish, and taried a great time in ATHENS, respected and well beloued of euery man. In the latter end of Themistocles life, Plutarch sheweth that he was a boorder and lying in Ammonius house, and in talke at the table he brought him in, either disputing, or teaching his schollers. So the custome to teach the youth at that time was very fine and easie, to give children a tast and learning of vertue: for as the tutors imployed part of their time to discourse in the prefence of their disciples, they occupied them in the same exercise afterwards, and made them declare, and fay their opinion of diverse matters: so that in few weekes, by way of sport and recreation, they had runne through the secrets of Philosophie. Unto the which they ioyned also, besides their compositions and particular exercises, their familiar talke and recreative dispurations in their walkes, at their suppersand feasts, where nothing else could be heard but that which made the young men wife and vertuous in a flort space. That may be gathered out of Plutarchs writings, and out of those especially where he speaketh how shildren shold be taught, of the lecture of the Poets, how they should heare, his talke at the table, and a good number of declamations dispersed in the middest of his Morall workes. In this place I remember that which he himselfe spake in discourse, how a man should know a flatterer from a friend, touching the direction of this his tutor. Our maister Ammonius, saith he, perceiving in his lecture he made after dinner, that some of his disciples and familiars had made a larger dinner then was fit for students, he commanded one of his seruants, a freeman to beate his owne sonne: he could not (faith he) dine without vineger. When he had fpoken that, he cast his eyes vpon vs. fothar they which were indeed culpable, found that he meant it by them. We may see also in the first and fecond question of his third booke of talke at the table, how ready this Philosopher was to sharpen the spirits of young men that frequentedhim. Thus therefore Plutarch having so good a helpe, in few yeares he profited greatly in the knowledge of all the parts of Philosophy, and neuer went out of his countrey, nor travelled to vnderstand strange languages, although the Latine tongue was common in Rome, and in diverse places of the Romaine Empire: which extended it selfe into GREECE, and beyond, as Plutarch noteth in the end of his Platonicall questions. Without notwithstanding that he cuer profited much in the knowledge of any other tongue, saving in the knowledge of the GREEKE: the which also hath a tast of his Philosophie of BOETIA. He doth also confesse in the beginning of the life of Demosthenes, that whilest he was in ITALIE and in ROME, he had no leifure to studie, nor to exercise the Latine tongue, as well for the businesse he had then in hand, as to satisfie those that frequented him to learne Philosophic of him. So that very late, being well stepped on in yeares, he beganto take Latine learned the bookes in hand, wherein there happened a strange thing vnto him, but yet true not with stan-Latine tong, ding:that is, that he did not learne nor vnderstand things so much by the words, as by a certaine vse and knowledge he had of things, he attained to the vnderstanding of the words. But furthermore (they are his owne words) to know how to judge well, wherein confifteth the beautie of the Latine tongue, or to speake it readily, or to vnderstand the figures, translations, and the fine knitting of simple sayings one with the other, which do adorne and beautifie the tongue, Ithinke well (faid he) that it is a very goodly thing and pleasant: but withall it requireth a long and laboursome exercise, fit for those that be at better leisure then I am, and that be yet able for age to attend such finenesse. That which is about spoken of, sheweth that in Sciences of that time they learned sciences in their mother tongue, so that even from their cradle children old learned began to enter into the schoole of the Muses, and pierced into the goodliest secrets of the same, having in their owne tongue the arts and goodly disciplines discovered even to the bottome: whereas presently the best of our age stealeth away in learning of words, and when we should enter into the knowledge of things, our memorie is ouer-whelmed, and judgement altered with an infinitio of objects, which (like diverse fawces) have most times altered our right tast. Insomuch that almost commonly we see, that we delight for the most part to heape together letters ypon letters, and after a great prouision of strange words, we find our selues children, and voide of the true knowledge of things. But now to come againe to Plutareh, as touching his fufficiency and his aduancement in sciences, we need not speake of them in particular, considering that his writings doe fufficiently proue them, and that we have also spoken something in the preface of his Morall workes.

Now, as his good fortune made him meete with excellent mafters, and men very carefull to manure fo noble aspirit: so he for his part answered their hope very sufficiently, shewing himselfe even from his infancy to the end of his life wholly given to study with an earnest de. Plusareh fire(but well gouerned) to keepe his body in health, to content his mind, and to make himfelfe simm to flat profitable along time to himfelfe, and to others alfo. Which was no hard matter for him, having benecarefully brought vp, cuen from his cradle, and fo well gouerned, as was requifite to maintaine himselfe long in strength; his fathers house and table being a schoole of temperance and of frugality. Confidering furthermore that talke with learned men was very necessary for him to attaine to that which he pretended: and having a mind defirous to excel in al things, he travelled Plutarets into AGYPT, & talked there of all the ancient do arine with the wifest men, whereof afterwards stauels. hemade a collection and intituled it, of Ilis and Oliris: which is yet left ynto ys, where he shewth himselfe to be well studied in the diunity and philosophy of the AGYPTIANS. From thence hereturned againe into GRECE, and vifited the townes and vniuerfities where there were any Philosophers, & frequented them all, to gather together the goodly instructions which he hath left vs. Moreouer he began to make collections, & culled our remembrances not only out of the books already published, but also of the notable talke and discourse which he vnder food of the one & the other also of registers & authentical instruments kept in towns where he came, wherofafterwards he did most artificially frame the most part of his workes. And pretending such alandable end, the better to establish his conceits, and to speake with a more commendable authority and good maner: he made a journey vnto the city of Sparta, of purpose to see the papers & memories of all the government of this goodly commonwealth, & of their lawmakers. kings, & Ephores, and gathered together all their notable deeds and fayings fo carefully as could bepossible, euento the least words of the simple souldiers and women of Sparra, together with all their customes, ordinances, ceremonies, and fashions to live in common, and particularly, in war and in peace. He did the like in diverse other commonwealths, as his lives, and the demands ofthings pertaining to the GREEKS and ROMAINE, s doth amply proucit: without which collections also it was unpossible for him to have left in writing such particularities, & he could not but of necessity have had communication with a great number of men louers of antiquities. Vnto that he loyned a curious fearch of statues, mettals, inscriptions, paintings, tables : also of Prouerbes, Epigrams, Epitaphs, Apophthegms, & other ornaments of history, to leave nothing behind him. And being continually almost in the company of learned men in all professions, it seemeth his memory was alwaies bent to gather, & his judgement occupied to discerne that which was to be reiected or retained. By which meanes he faw himfelf in a short time advanced to the knowledge of all things: moreouer he had in his hand goodly briefes and collections, with the which he finely holpe himselfe, and afterwards made a good part vnto his friends and posterity. Hehimfelfe at the beginning of his booke treating of the contentment and quietneffe of the mind, makes mention of the memories which he had of long time made for his owneyle. So Plusards that out of this rich closet he hath drawne the excellent peeces which have remained vnto vs. and which shew how much we have lost being deprived of them that are no more to be found, and quietnes and the which time hath dispersed, or veterly consumed.

Now though that in generallit may be faid, that this man was ignorant in no learning, nor ofthe goodly fecrets of nature: yet this word we must adde to it, that whosoever shall duly confider the entrance, continuance, composition, binding and inclosing of his discourse, be it that he write an history, or that he by any treaty apart will put backe vice, and make vertue to be beloued: be it that he sport himselfe in clearing the difficulties of natural Philosophie, or of the Mathematickes: be it that he beginneth to commence some disputation against those whose opinions he disproueth: we shall find in his writings an exact and easie method both together, method of his proofes found, and his inductions pleasant and agreeable to all forts of wits, and of such writing.

Plutarch foundeth into the depth of fects; and conserfeth with learnea

pithie discourses, so that of force we must confesse, that this person had bene most excellently directed in his studies, considering that in speaking after such an easie manner, he presentethso profound instructions, and I cannot tell what, where there is alwaies somewhat to be learned Furthermore, feeing dinerse sects in credit in his time, it seemeth he had a good will to found into the depth of the value & error of them. Then reaching higher yet, he hath fearched out the opinions of the first Sages. So that the Pythagorians, Platonians, Epicurians, Stoickes, and Peripateticians, with their precepts have bene very familiar with him. But not being content with turning ouer the leaves of their writings, and feeing to the end all that which the naturall Philofophers have thought of the secrets of the world; yet would be familiarly frequent those whom he viderstood to be practised in sciences, and conferre with them, viderstand their reasons. and be throughly refolued of them: and at the length obtained his defire, as his bookes make mention. That was accompanied with a continual reading of all forts of good Authors, as well to amplifie his collections, as ftill more and more to enrich his memory, and to polish his judgement: as may be noted in his workes three severall excellencies of his spirit. For fom of them are certaine declamations made in the schoole, and by way of exercise, as we have shewed them placed at the beginning of the same: forthat if he would have taken the paines to have reviewed and smoothed those peeces there, they would have seemed to be others then they were. But we perceive that he left some unperfect, not thinking that that (which ferued not but for a proofe of fome thing better laboured) deferued to come to light. There are also some other discourses better polithed, yet in such fort notwithstanding, that it plainely appeareth, he might have amplified them and made them better. And there be other peeces, vnto the which it may be faid, he hath put his last hand; as are his Liues, and the most part of his Morall workes, written at leifure, very aduitedly, confidered in all vnderstanding and to diverse reiterations. He could have done the like in all, and with the like stile have raised his writings to their perfection: but having as it were more expressely stayed himselfe vpon fome, he hath showed therein the disposition of his studies, and with what discretion he spent histime.

Now, though he had tafted of all the feets of the Philosophers, yet you may perceive that inclining to the Platonians (for hegreatly reverenced Socrates and Plato, whose birth dayes he did yearely celebrate) he neverthelette that himfelfe within the bounds of modestie of certaine ACADEMICKES, being content simply to propound the things, but to leauethem to the judgement of the readers, forcing no man. Furthermore, we see with what diligence he had turned ouer the leaves of the writings of the Epicurians, and of the Stoickes, against whom he stoutly opposed himselfe. But morall Philosophie was his chiefest end: for the rationall, the naturall, and the Mathematickes (the which he had greatly studied) they were but simple passimes in comparison of the other. Whereupon may be discerned, that having received in himselfe a fingular pleasure of such study, he alwaies sought to print the same defire and contentment in the thought of all men, leaving the speculations and pricking questions: onely tending to this good, to bring wisedome into the houses, to establish it in the thrones of kings, to make it go in the firectes, to lodge it in the eyes, in the eares, vpon the tongues, and in the bottome of the hearts of all men. See here what his thoughts have bene, which he could well difgeft afterwards: fo that it feemeth he was altogether given to that. Now though he was occupied in meditations and fo excellent workes, he forgot not therefore any thing that was requifite for the exercises of his body, such as men vsed at that time, to keepe their spirits in strength, as also more toyfully to passeouer so many other crosses as our life is assailed withall. And we may fee also in the precepts he hath written of health, that albeit Physicke was not his profession, neuerthelesse hee learned that which was the principall for his owne private good. For in that booke of his, he speaketh reasonably of the vse of meates, and sheweth from what meates we should abstaine. Afterwards having declared in what fort one should vse his appetite and the pleasures of the body, he condemneth the excesse of drinking and eating, he teacheth how to preuent ficknesse, setteth downe remedies, treateth of diet, and of signes of ficknesse, and of the true waies how to keepe health. And thereupon he commethto reason of the exercises and diet of students, laying that open which we should most carefully observe therein: which maketh me beleeve, that he having knowne so well what was fit for the preservation of the body, he did wifely helpe himselse: as also even to very old age he hathborne office in the commonwealth, and alwaigs carried a body and mind lufty and ready to take paines, having had this wisedome, to consider well his nature and disposition; also to take fuch meates and drinks as were good for his stomacke, and to vie them soberly, and keeping his hody in good state by commendable exercises and nouriture to make himself profitable along time for humane fociety. It is true, that he being a graue man, raifed to honour, and a Philosopher by profession, his chiefest exercises of body were to walke with other learned men, where without contention of words he alwaies decided fome points of philosophic. Furthermore he loued to talke at the table, and to mingle pleafant grave matters with some new device: so wittily and fweetly to enterlace and deuide the courfe of his life, being no crabbed nor fullen perfon, but pleasant, and whose company was troublesome to none; and otherwise as sober and discreet in his talke, as he was in drinking and eating.

PLVTARCH.

Sother his maners, as well alone, as with his friends and openly, do shew, that truly he had a good foule within abody well tempered. Now I do not enter here into the examination of the idiculous opinions of Plutarch in matter of religion, being fory that so rare a spirit hath bene so miserably enuironed with the darknesse which was at that time in the most part of the towns &men of Grece, & specially among so many wise men, strangely ignorant and dull in respect Plutareh of the knowledge of the true God. If we had not bin warned betimes by the true and onely wife ignorant of men taught in the schoole of eternall wisdome, of such a judgement of God vpon the wife men "God," of the world, who have bene confounded in their discourse, when there hath bene question of the honor due to our foueraigne Lord: then we might have bene aftonied, and remained as men cast away. And whereas so many great wise men haue erred in their waies, that will not excuse them before their judge, as if he had kept the light from them. For, fince that which may be knowne of his eternity and omnipotent power, hath bene reuealed vnto them in nature and in Philosophie: ftaying a man vpon himselfe, or vpon other creatures, and forsaking the onely Creator, they condemne themselues by their owne words and writings. Now to come against to Plutarch. He having bene Apolloes Priest, as himselfe confesseth, and from his youth suckled with the foolish dotings of the GREEKES: I do not finde it strange, that many absurd opinions and without good ground (yea wicked & pernicious) are scattered in his disputations, touching the default of Oracles, of the religion of the IEVVES, of the inscription of the letter E'i' in the temple of D_{ELPHES} ; why the propheteffe Pythia doth nomore give her Oracles in verse; and in many places of the Liues and works, in the which he openly incline th to the superstitions and Atheismes of the PAGANS. There he sheweth a conscience evill informed, and a man running very fwiftly out of the right way. By the fame meanes a man may plainely note, that in matter offupernaturall and dinine Philofophy, another manner of light then that of our corrupt vnderflanding is wholly required, not being possible that a man left to his owne wit can comprehend the things which are of God: because they are discerned after a fashion meerly vnknowne vinohim, and of the which he cannot be partaker but by a speciall grace, and which nature doth not bestow upon him, but he which hath made and reformed nature. It is no maruell then if Plutarch should be missed, that hath had so many instructions and masters strayed from the way of the eternall truth, and whose predecessours were drowned in the bottomlesse pit of ignorance. Yet notwithstanding, in the middest of that darknesse he hath had so much light. that he seemeth, at times, to note and condemne the labyrinth of errour, as a man that hath lost his way in an horrible darke night, should from one time to another be directed rightly by the light of the flashings of lightning. For some do gather by his discourse of the cessation of the Oracles, and by other places, that he did acknowledge one God, and very liberally condemnedmany old and new superstitions, vnto the which both himselse, and others his like, did cleaue, rather by custome for fashions sake, and to please the people, then for any opinion they had that they were ought worth. But as I have faid, my intention is not to judge this person nor his deeds: confidering that befides the matter I touch (euery where, where he goeth out of the way) he confuteth himselfe sufficiently; witnesse his discourse of superstition, and the feuenth chapter of his first booke touching the opinions of the Philosophers, where he will dispute of the eternal providence: and the third question of the second booke at talke of the table, making mention of the egge: and the last question of the fourth booke, where he medleth with speaking of God, and of the ceremonies of the IEVVEs. In the meane time, and in the middest of this great blindnesse, they see in Plutarch a heart that is enemie vnto vice, and a friend of good manners. Let a man fee him in his family, in the schoole, in bankets, with his friends, and openly: behold, there is a graue man, modest in behaulour, sharpe, learned, and pleasant in his discourses, offending nor hurting no man. If he speake of vice, he letteth out the filthinesse, and scantly maketh the patient cry. If he speake for vertue, it is with such efficacy, that cuery man may know he spake of the aboundance of his heart. He is a good father of a house. a wife Schoole-master, a graue Historian, a braue Politician, an excellent Philosopher, a good Writer to imitate: and furthermore, a faithfull, profitable, true, and a joyfull counfellor and friend. His plaineneffe, fimplicity, and grave modestie shineth in all his writings: his vertue. accompanied almost ordinarily with all other things, which we need not speake of particularly neither to vnfold the life of our Philosopher from one part to another to see his vprightnesse. integritic, grauity, sweetnesse, constancie, force, prudence, temperancie, and liberality: that may be truly spoken of him, which had bene long time before applied in the Theaters vnto A_{m_1} phiaraus, and to Aristides:

He little cares to feeme vpright, but Arineth fo tobe, In deepest thoughts preferring vertue still: Whence day by day, proceeding we do fee

Plutarchs Speeches a. gainst cho-

In testimony of his sweete grauity, and of part of his thoughts, I will alledge some words couched in his owne discourse against choler. As for me, said he, If I have done well or cuill Iknownot, not by that meanes I have rid my felfe of choler. As the LAGED EMONIANS did in old time, who to learne their children not to be drunke at all, shewed them their slaues being drunke: fo do I confider the effects of choler in others. And afterwards he addeth more, that a man should accustome himselfe to beare many of his wives words, and of his familiars and friends, which do reproue vs for that we are too gentle and foft. And this was the chiefest cause (said he) why I was so often angry with my seruants, fearing they would waxe worse for want of reproofe and correction. But I observed my selfe at the last, though late, that first I were better by patience and pardoning them, make my scruants worse, then to hurt my felfe by sharpnesse and choler, seeking to reforme others. I considered also with my felfe, and remembred (faid he) that as he which teacheth vs to shoote in a bow, doth not forbid vs to draw, but to faile in drawing: fo he that teacheth vs to punish in time and place, moderately, profitably, and as we should: doth not let vs but that we may punish. I doe labour all I can to withdraw, and vtterly to banish all choler: principally because I would not take from them that are punished, the meane to instific themselues, and to heare them. For time bringeth, in the interim to the passionate mind, a delay and forgetfulnesse, which diffolueth it: in which space the judgement of reason findeth both the meane and the measure to give reasonable correction. And besides that, they give the partie punished no place to refift the punishment if he be not corrected in anger and choler, but convinced for that he had well deferued it. And (which were yet more vnfeemely) they shall not find that the feruant punished speaketh more justly then his master that punisheth him. Touching this purpose, I will remember the pleasant report which the Philosopher Taurus made of Plutarch, as Gellius reciteth it in the fixe and twentieth chapter of the first booke of his Nights Attiques, as some man hath heretofore expressed it in our language. A slaue, a vile and vicious man (but yet that had his eares fomewhat instructed with bookes and disputations of Philosophy) having bene stripped naked for some fault he had done, by the commandement of his master Plutarch, whilest they were whipping of him, he grumbled at the first, that it was without reason, and that he had done nothing: but in the end crying out amaine, and iniuring his mafter, he told him that he was no Philosopher as he bragged himselfe to be: and that he often heard him say it was a fowle thing to be angrie, yearhat he made a booke of it: and that now (ouercome with choler) in making him be beaten fo cruelly, he vtterly belied all his writings. Thereunto Plutarch coldly and quietly answered: Why, how now roifter, faid he? whereby doeft thou thinke that I am angry at this prefent? my countenance, my voice, my colour, my words, do they give thee any figne that I am angrie: I do not thinke I have cruelleyes, nor a troubled face, nor any fearefull crie. Do I blushe do I fome doth s any thing escape me that I should repent me? do I stampe? do I rage? For to tell thee truly, these be the shewes of choler. Afterwards hee turned to him that whipped him: faving: Forward with your bufinesse, whiles he and I do reason the matter. Furthermore, we may easily gather what Plutarch was amongst his friends, from the nine bookes containing the questions decided at the table. And for his disputations against the Epicyrians and Stoicks? they show that this person for the regard of his actions concerning the commonwealth haning respect vnto those whom at that time he made his judges, and to the posterity into whose hands his writings might come hereafter, he alwaies caried himfelfe in fuch a modest granity, that they could require no more of him. And if sometime he did feelingly touch some as colores, and Herodetwit was not in vaine. Also he alwaies vsed terms which witnessed that he had an vpright foule. To be short, it appeareth enery where that his passions were maruellous well staied. Plutarch And if any of them were furious or violent, he could tell in time and place how to reforme, his affettithem by the precepts of Philosophy, leading (as is faid) a life without blame of men. But aboue all the rest, when any discourse or disputation drew him into it, to speake of shamefull or dishonest things, he did convey it with such discretion as it cannot be amended whereof we need not to bring forth examples dispersed in his writings, and especially in the dialogue of Loue, feeing that being concealed it doth no hurt, as also remembred or too expressly reucaled, it cannot but hurt the eyes, and an honest thought.

Furthermore, Plutarchs studie of Philosophie tooke not away the care he had to live with fome profit amongst men, nor made him to disdaine the meanes which his predecessors had left him. But as he came of a noble house, and with time being advanced vnto office and charge in the commonwealth, greatly effeemed of Traian the Emperor, and of the noble men of Rome. he faw he had goods inough to line at case: whereof not with standing he never made such account as that he would forget his study, and intangle himselfe in the snare of the lone of riches. in the which fo many miserable soules have bin engaged vnto death. His means serued his turne to maineraine himselfe among his friend, and to bring up his children; for he had many of an ho- Plutarelis norable Lady which he maried, & loued most dearely. Amongst his other sons, himself maketh children. mention of Autobulus, of Plutarchus, & of Charon, who died a yong infant, & fome others whom he nameth not at all. Alfo of daughters, two of the which were maried to Firmus, and vnto Craton, learned Philosophers; and Timoxene, who died very yong. As for Autobulus, he maried in his fathers life time, and it is not welknowne, whether Sextus of CHERONEA, a Philosopher of the Scepts, who lived in great honour in the Empire of Antonius, was his sonne, or the sonne of Plus tarchus. That which I am now about to speake of, may be gathered out of diverse places in the workes of Plutarch, and specially of the discourse at the table. And in the consolation which he wrote to his wife vpon the death of their daughter, they may note that the was an honorable Lady, modest, and vertuous, well attended on with women and seruants, and otherwise louing to her children, and bearing great renerence vnto her husband. That the house of Plutarch was Plutarch very well gouerned that he had a great number of kinsfolkes and friends. And in other places of house well his booke intituled Sympolium, and other treaties, we may know that his folines and nephews were fludious and learned, and specially in the fixt question of his eight booke of talkeat the table, speaking of his yongest children: who because they taried somewhat longer at the Theater then they should have done, to see and heare the pastimes they made there, came by that meanes late to supper: is shewed sufficiently that they now began to follow the fathers steps. And there appeared in no part any euill touch among st these persons, but as Plutarch did converse in a fingular reverence, friendship and gentlenesse, with his grandfather, his father and his brethren, we are to judge the like conversation with his wife, his children, and his nephews: as also they be. ing in fogood a schoole, could not faile but enery day to go forward in the knowledge and practife of vertue.

But as a fountaine hidden feructh to no vse, so it had little prevailed Flutareb to have seene, read, and gathered fo much together, vnlesse he had made litle streames runne from such a lively and goodly fountaine, vnto fuch places where his vertue might shine more then in any other parts of the world. That was ITALIE, and the city of Rome, the feate of the Empire, and where Plawhere (notwithstanding the disorders brought in by former warres, and by the dissolutions tarehy reand tyrannics of fome Emperours) there were many learned men, and in the Emperors court also some counsellors, and other persons of authority which loued vertue. Now Plutarch having begun to advance himselfe in GRECE, about the time of Vespasian and Titus, it seemeth he came to Rome immediatly after the death of Titus, vnder Domitian, as well to make

profession there of Philosophy, as also that he might more nearely know the ancient gouerness ment of the commonwealth, and to increase his collections, from the which proceeded afterwards infinite particularities inclosed in his workes: but especially the Liues of the noble Ro-MAINES compared with the GREEKS. For my part, I thinke Plutarch was drawne to Rome by meanes of some friends he had there, especially by Sossius Senecio, that had bene a Consull, who was of great estimation at that time, and namely vnder the Empire of TRAIAN. And that which makethme thinke fo, is because of Plutarchs owne words, who faith in the beginning of his first booke of his discourse at the table, that he gathered together all his reasons and discourses made here and there, as well in ROME with Senecio, as in GRECE, with Plutarch and others. Not being likely that he would have taken the pains to have made fo long a voyage, & to have come to fuch a city where he vnderstood not their vulgar tongue, if he had not bene drawne thither by Senecio, and fuch other men: as also in acknowledgement of the good turnes and honour he had received by fuch men, he dedicated diverse of his bookes vnto them, and among others, the Liues vnto Senecio, and the nine volumes of his discourse at the table; with the treaty, How a man may know that he profiteth in vertue. Now for the time, confidering what he faith in the end of his booke against curiosity, I suppose that he taught in Roma in the time of Titus and of Domitian: for touching that point, he maketh mention of a noble man called Rusticus, who being one day at his lecture, would not open a letter which was brought him from the Emperour. nor interrupt Plutarch, but attended the end of his declamation, and vntill all the hearers were gone away: and addeth also, that Rusticus was afterwards put to death by the commandement of Domitian. Furthermore, about the beginning of the life of Demosthenes, Plutarch saith. that whilest he remained in ITALY and at ROME, he had no leisure to studie the Latine tongue: as well for that he was busied at that time with matters he had in hand, as also to satisfie those that were his followers to learne Philosophie of him. He doth not tell what matters he hadin hand besides his profession: but following that which Suidas and others spake of him, that he was neare to the person of Traian, and had the honor and place to be his schoole-master and teacher, or, at the leastwise, one of so many learned men as this Prince made much of, as some story writers do testifie, he was honoured and advanced to some charge or government: which, I thinke, is that he speaketh of in this place. Now furthermore, his chiefest labour was publickely to teach all the parts of Philosophie, mingling in his declamations and lectures a diligent and curious search of all that the ancient Philosophers, reasonable, naturall, or morall, of what sect focuer they were, had treated of: as appeareth by his writings, which are as summaries of his leffons and orations he made with his owne voice. His speech doth not flow so as that of many other Philosophers, Oratours, and Greeke Historians, but being come later, and in a more rude and harsh world, his style also is more hard, briefe, enforced, and Philosopherlike: ayming at this marke to instruct the mind first, not tarying to tickle the eares much, though he did fill and content them learnedly. But the flowing sweetnesse we tast in Plato, in Xenophon, in Herodotus, and in some other, wanting indeed in Plutarch, is supplied and recompenced in him by infinite stories, sentences, similitudes, and notable particulars which he boroweth of others, and whereof he composed a worke so well deuided, so rich, and so pleasant, by reason of his varietie, that it is not possible to reade bookes of a more gentle and profitable reading, amongst all the historians, and Philosophers, GREEKES or ROMAINES. If Plutarch then doth & this present content all forts of men, what may we thinke he did with his lively voice ? but after the example of this Hercules of GAVLE, which held his auditors eares fast chained to his tongue: s fo hath he by hisgoodly documents, moved an infinite number of men, to leave vice, and to cloath them with the loue of vertue.

So he having continued these exercises for some yeares, being heard and visited of all sorts of men, grew to be of fuch reputation, that the greatest persons began to seeke him and to make much of him, yearo think themselues honoured by his friendship: as his books dedicated vnto some of them do sufficiently testifie it. And touching the accesse he had about the person of Traian himself, it may be gathered from the beginning of this goodly collection of Apophthegmes, which he dedicated to this great Emperour, what was his intention: that is to wit, to serue for the good of all the Romaine Empire, giving wholesome instructions vnto the head thereof. For he wifely judged, that in ruling the thoughts of that man, it was to give phificke at once vnto all the subjects of that great Monarchie. The same being a common thing, that

Subjects and kingdomes commonly do chuse The manners that their Princes daily vie.

Itis true that fuch instructions, in respect of Traian, do onely concerne his person and politicke affaires. For as touching the only true religion, it was meerely vinknowne of Plutarch, and rudely perfecuted under the Empire of Traian: who notwithstanding in the end being softened by the precepts of moral Philosophy, and through the aduct tisements his deputic governors gave him. & namely Plinius feeundus gouernor of BITHYNIA, of the innocencie of the Christians; or rather referrained by the secret prouidence of our soueraigne Lord, (who excellently strengthened his. put the Oracles of the lying spirit to silence, and ouerthrew Idolatry in most places) he caried himselfe more gently, and did forbid to vexe and trouble them any more, whom before they had pursued with all forts of cruelties. Furthermore, I thinke that it was in fauour of Train persecuting chiefly, that Plutarch made certaine particular Treatiles (besides the lives of Noblemen,) and of brists amongst others that, where he maintaineth that it is requisite a Prince should be wise: The infiruction for those that deale in the affaires of estate: The notable sayings of GREEKES and Ro-MAINES, and others concerning the dutie of Princes, and great Lords. Now confidering that wherein he reasoneth, and briefly defendeth, (but grauely, and with assured proofes) that a Philosopher ought to converse with Princes: some may say that it is an Apologic of Plutarch, against the common and light objections of some Courtiers, which thinkethat Princes cannot be well counfelled, but by men that blow (as they fay) fire with their mouthes, and that carie therapier and dagger in their hands: and would that men of learning (whom in scorne they call schoolemasters and Philosophers) should be turned to their studie, or into a schoole, to crie out there as much and as lowd as they thinke good. Therefore he was willing as well to encourage himselfe first in that discourse, as also to remedie what in him lay, certaine euils infinitely abounding and overflowing in others. In all times and ages every man hath granted and Mon of confessed, that amongst those that want good companie, are Princes, Lords, and great perso-great place nages. For their affaires being so important and weighty, as every man knoweth, their bodies company. being weake, and their spirits not able to dispatchall things: they must needes see by others eyes, and worke with others hands. Whereupon there are three forts of men which are to be Three Gris reproued. For the first, they are the Princes themselves, who in stead of calling and drawing of minfault neare vnto them, men of honour that might helpe them in any matter, they give accesse vnto ill-minded men, that corrupt them, and ouerthrow their effate. The second (but a small number at all times) are the Philosophers, that is to say, men of authority, wise, learned, louers ofvertue, and of the good of Princes and of their fubicets: who being able to do much, yet they draw backetor being aduanced, have not alwaies that confideration nor courage that is fit, being oftentimes caried away with the greatest opinion, and mingling somewhat too much their humane wisedome with the apprehension of their true dutie: whereof their conscience being cleared diuerse waies, doth sufficiently informe them. For the last, they are ignorant tutors, or Atheifts, minions, flifters, iefters, flatterers, brokers of filthy pleasures, and such practifers, which by wicked meanes creepe into Princes Courts, houses and closets. And in recompense of the tharges they boldly accept, and of the treasures which they heape together with a wicked confcience, and do afterwards fpend of the fame, they do deceive, dishonor, and finally vndo their vnwise mafters: as a million of examples in histories do testifie. Plutarch therefore confidering these things, doth attempt in this Treatise to give courage vnto those, that have a desire to see all things well ordered; and fuch maner of men doth he exhort to be about Princes. But because granity and wisdome maketh men modest and slow as to the contrary, ignorance & malice maketh them haue brafen faces he fheweth, that it is no ambition of a Philofopher to be about great Lords, but rather that his duty doth beare it, fithence that fuch receive honor, pleafure & profit. and this he proueth by reasons, & notable examples. But aboue al, he forgetteth not to fet vpon, Flutarth the that come to Princes courts to make the clus great, shewing that Philosophers should shoot them that at another marke. And last of all he treateth of the contentment those receive, which serving one follow Prin. alone, do by the same means help an infinite number of others that are bound vnto them for so essents great a good turne. I have written at large the argument of this treatie of Plus arch, because it containeth the briefe of all & conceits of this Philosopher coming to the Emperor: & it is a patterne greatalso to all learned methat enter into y seruice of great lords, which if they wil painfully follow, Iiiii4

The cause that maketh me speake this, is the consideration of the estate in the which the Fma pire of Rome stood at that time, the which if any man will at ley fure confer with that which he may gather out of many parts of Plutarchs workes, he shall find the words of Plato very true. that happie are those commonwealths which are gouerned by Philosophers, or by Princes that haue Philosophers about them. For like as an expert pylote by his skill and knowledge refisheth the winds and billowes of the sea, and in despite of their force beareth saile to the desired ha-The benefit ' nen: euen fo when the ship of the commonwealth hath a master that guideth it by the precents of Philosophie, the government is peaceable and happy enery way. And if any storme happen, and necessity requireth it, he finely plucketh downe the failes, and yeeldeth himselfe in fuch fort to the waves, that he escapethand ouercometh it with honor. Dion writeth, that one of the first acts of Traian did, after he was chosen Emperor in the place of Nerua, was, that he wrote letters with his owne hand to the Senate of Rome, promiting by them he would never purany man to death, or make him infamous, that was an honest man; and this he afterwards confirmed by folemne oth. He put Alianus and the fouldiers Prætorians to death, because they mutined a gainst Nerna. And after he had made his entric into Rome, he gave good order for the affaires of the estate, and specially fauoured vertuous men many waies, granted them great priviledges. and gaue meanes to the cities of Iraly to bring vp their youth. He reigned Emperor nineteene yeares and a halfe, being two and forty yeares old when he was chosen. His behaulour was such that he obtained the name of a inft, valiant, moderate, and a good Prince: fo that in the flower of his youth, they noted in him aftayed judgement, and in his age a great courage. He enuied no man, he hurt no man, he raifed good men to honorable place and charge in the commonwealth: whereby it came to passe that he was never afraid, nor had no enemy in the world. Accusers had no accesse voto him: he was as gentle a Prince as was possible, and as much an enemy of cone-Constitutions' toufnesse, as he was of murthers and robberies. In time of peace and war he was at great charge in stately buildings, witnesse the wonderfull bridge ouer Danuby. But with magnificence fuch enterprises and reparations ordinarily were necessary, without oppressing or wronging any man: for he was a noble Prince, that defired rather to be beloued of his subjects, and much made of, then feared, as forme of his predeceffors. To meane men he shewed himselfe courteous, and easie to have accesse vnto: grave and honourable among the Senatours. The Romaines loued him as much as they could possible, and his enemies infinitely were afraid of him. His pastimes were hunting, feasting, and the Theater to see common playes and sports. Oftentimes he would be prinate with his friends, and came without his guard into their honses; yea sometimeshe would lyethere, and paffe away the night. He was not of the wifest, although by his behaulour they could not judge otherwise of him, but that he was a wise and learned Prince. There was nothing in him but it was excellent, and in manner blameleffe. For although he loued to drinke , wine, and delighted to fee faire boyes: yet for all this he neuer committed any fouleact, being very warie in his passions, and about all, keeping himselfe from abusing his authority. He desired nothing but war, but it was principally to ouercome his enemies, and to enrich his friends. Furthermore, he was so fortunate and braue a chieftaine of an army, so beloued of his Captains and fouldiers, that there was neuer any mutinic or diforder in his campe. That made him dreadfull to those that troubled him neare or farre off, of which the chiefest was Decebalus king of the DACIANS: whom he purfued so hard, that being vnpossible for him to escape, he killed himselfe. Furthermore he made warre with the PARTHIAN'S, with the ARABIAN'S, and with the IEVVES, with dinerfe euents, but almost alwaies to his aduantage. Furthermore, to come to his manners, he loued fo faithfully, that it was a hardthing to make him thinke guill of those whom he loued, which we will proue by some example. Certaine ill-willers brought him word that Sura Licinius, one of his prinate friends, did practise somewhat against him. In stead of taking it ill to conreine ahard opinion of him, he went (vnbidden) into Sura his house, he would sup there, and sending backe his guard, first he made Sura his Phistion come to him, and shewed him his eyes to helpe some griefe that troubled him: not being so contented, he sendeth for his Barber to shaue his beard; then being trimmed, and having washed, he fate downe at the table and supped.

The next morning fome reporting vnto him the ill will that sura did beare him: If he would haue killed me, faid he, yesterday he might haue done it, for he had meanes to doit. This Sura was he vnto whom Traian had given the office of the great Marshal of the Empire; and coming to him to tie his girdle baudricke wife about his necke, having the fword drawne in his hand, he yfed this speech vnto him: Receive this sword of me, and if I command as I ought, employ it in Appendix my defence: if I dootherwise, draw it against me, and take my life from me. He caused statues mand. to be fet vp of Sosieis Senecio, of Palma, and of Celfus, who were all three Senators whom about all others he loued and honored. Hefet up Libraries, and did many notable acts, in testimonic of his great courage. But that which most of all other doth commend him, is, that having done wonderfull much good to the Empire, by decree of the Senate, he was furnamed Optimus Imperator: that is to fay, most good Emperor. And so was he wonderfully beloued of the Senators. and officers of the Empire, of all the people, and especially of the fouldiers, amongst whom he would be fo familiar as if they had bene his companions. Furthermore, nothing pleased him fo much as this title of Optimus: wherein he gloried amongst his friends, and did more & more indenour to shew himselfe so. And also after him (as Eutropius reporteth) when any new Emperor was chosen by the Senate, after the showtings of happie presage, and well wishings, of the Senat tors, they cried out vnto him: What, canst thou be more fortunate then Augustus, and better then Traian? Nowif we bring to the writings of Plutarch the life of this Prince, we will fay that Traian bet. the Prince did alwaies thinke of the wife precepts of the Philosopher; and on the other fide, that the Philosopher hath framed the deeds of the Prince to the rule of good life, which he hath fo writings: fully propounded to great and meane men. And therefore it is not to be maruelled at, if Plutarch declare (to the high praise of Traian and the Senate) in his treatie, where he instructeth those that deale in publike affaires, that in his time for peace fake, people had no need of wife gouernours to defend them: for (faid he) all the warres against the GREEKES and barbarous people are fled from vs. Thus standeth the estate of the Empire, the which it any man will particularly conferre with that which Plutarch fetteth downe in his writings, he shall find it was happie to haue met with fo wel disposed hearts, to receive, & carefully to practife his goodly lessons. And that as it was a fingular honour to Trainn by his vertue to have obtained a furname that made him greater then the most part of the Romaine Emperors: so is Plutarch enery way to be commended, that was the excellent inftrument to advance and maintaine fo great a good. Whereupon I defire his Morals shold be specially remembred, to apply that which he speaketh of vice. and vertue, vnto that which hath bene touched in the life of Traian. For I thinke the one can hardly be spoken of, but that the other by the same meanes must be remembred. And it seemeth that one felfe foule hath put forward thefe two hearts, both to give and receive one commendable instruction. Onely for proofe a man may with his eye run oner two or three discourses. As for example, that of the difference betwixt the flatterer and the friend: Against choler: How a some speciman may know if he profit in the exercise of vertue: That it is requisite a Prince should be wise: all Treatifes The influction forthose which deale in the affaires of the estate: The apophthegmes: and there sarch. shall a man find the rules which the Emperour Traian could wifely apply to himselfe, and pra-

So could be well acknowledge the good he had received of Plutarch, being a noble and bountifull Prince, as hath bene faid here-before. For, besides the great honour he had done him at Hamour Rome, having made him a Confull, he commanded (as faith Suidas) that all the magistrates and Platarch officers which were in the Province of SLAVONY, should do nothing but under his authority. If by Traise, we had the bookes of Marius Maximus, of Fabius Marcellinus, of Aurelius Verus, and of Statius Valens, which have written the life of Traian: we might eafily draw on this matter further, the which Suidas (according to his file) is contented to touch in one word. And Dion who was a GREEKE, a man very forgetfull for an Historian, & that in some places shewed he had no great indgement: he seemeth to have suppressed the name of Plutarch, as though he had bene offended with the fame obtained by this man. Or else, if one will take things in good part, as I encline vnto it, it may be he thought he needed make no mentio of one whose writings made him to be known sufficiently. Yet furthermore, I do not find that Plutarch was in SLAVONIE at all, and if so be that he made any iourney thither, I thinke he taried not long there because it appearethin diuerse places of his works; that his abode was most in ITALY and in GRECE. And for his honorable charges committed vnto him, that should not be thought very strange, if we consider the merits of Plutarch, the names of Traian, and the good will that Sosius Senecio (one of the principall men of Rome, and of the chiefest fauourites of Traian) bare vnto Plutarch. For he that was in so great credit with his master, would not forget him whom he loued aboue all other menwherein he loft not his time, for a fmuch as the flatue that was fet vp for him, & that which Dion and some others do briefly passe ouer, do not commend Sossim, as do the prefaces of honor, and the bookes which Plutareh dedicated vnto him. The which we need no more rehearfe, then to write ouer againe the Epistle of Plutarch vnto Traian, the which is written in Latine, as Amont sheweth in his preface of the Liues: where he hath inferted the Epistle at length, because he thought it wifely and grauely written, a briefe worthy of fuch a Philosopher as Plutarch. That which Cufpinianus faith in the latter end of the life of Traian, seemeth to touch this: speaking alfo, as if it had bene expressed out of Greeke into Latine. But time hath deprined vs of that, and of many other goodly peeces of the felfe fame, as we have somewhat spoken of it before in the beginning of the Morall works. Now he hath written nothing touching his behauiour in his publike charge, but contenteth himfelfeto fpeake a word fometime paffing by, because he made no account of any thing but of Philosophy, through the helpe whereof heaffayed to make himself and others wifer, and more vertuous every day then other. Being athing very likely, that such a man as had so painfully considered of the state of the world, and of al sorts of publike gouernments, and had joyned his studies with so great experience: that he hath happily managed the charges that were committed vnto him. To conclude, to liue as we should amongst men, the fpeculation and knowledge of things being joyned with the practife of the same, do bring forth ioyned with excellent effects: whereas those that do content themselues with the simple theoricke, andothers that follow exercise, contemning the true vnderstanding of the causes and grounds of affaires, as Philosophic doth shew them, they oftentimes fall into wonderfull difficulties.

For Plutareh, though he taried along time in ITALY, and in ROME, yet that tooke not away the remembrance of the sweetaire of GREECE, and of the little towne where he was borne: but being touched from time to time with a fentence of an ancient Poet, who faid, that In what soener countrey men are bred,

Plutarchs

He refolued to go backe into GRECE againe, there to end the rest of his daies in rest and honor amongst his citizens, of whom he was honorably welcomed home. Some judge that helest Rome after the death of Traian, being then of great yeares, to leade a more quiet life. So being the at rest he earnestly took in hand that which he had long thought of before, to wit, the Liues: and tooke great pains in it vntill he had brought his worke to perfection, as we have done at this present: although that some Liues, as those of Scipio African, of Metellus Numidicus, & some other are not to be found. Now himselfe confesseth in some place, that when he began this worke, at the first it was but to profit others: but that afterwards it was to profit himselfe, looking vpon those histories, as if he had looked in a glasse, and seeking to reforme his life in some fort, and to forme it in the mould of the vertues of these great mentaking this fashion of searching their maners, and writing the Liues of these noble men, to be a familiar haunting & frequenting of them. Also he thought (faid he himselfe) that he lodged these men one after another in his house, entring into confideration of their qualities, and that which was great in either of them, choosing and principally taking that which was to be noted, and most worthy to be knowne in their sayings and deeds. In fumme, he declared that by continuance of reading ancient histories, and in drawing out the Liues which he hath written, and retaining daily in his understanding the memorable things of the most honest and vertuous men of times past, he instructed himselfe, and prepared him to lay afide all euill, foolish, dishonest, or spiteful conditions, if by chance, by often frequenting their company he must of necessity keepe, he learned any euill touch: the which he did reforme, turning his quiet thought, not stirred with any passion at all, to the consideration of so many goodly examples. Now because that some might object vnto him, that for the finithing of to great a peece of worke, he could not have made choise of a fitter place then Rome: or rather that being a man given to his booke as he was, he should have left that work vnto some other that had seene more. This objection being of some weight, he answereth it at the beginning of the life of Demosthenes, and faith: That to attaine to true felicity, (whereof the greatest part confifeth in the maners, qualities and condition of the foule) it maketh no matter whether Not the aman be borne in an obscure towne and of small name, no more then if he were borne of a foule Place, but or litle mother. For it were a mockery to think that fome finall townes or litle Ilands could notwithstanding bring forth good Poets and excellent players of Comedies: & that they could not mend am in like fort bring out an honest, just, constant, wife, and noble or worthy man. And although we have reason to think that arts and sciences invented to make things necessary for the vse of men, or elfeto win a name and reputation are made & counterfeited in poore litle towns: so we must also thinke that vertue, none other wife then a strange plant, can take foot and root in any place, where it meeteth with a good nature, gentle and patient to endure paines. Wherfore if we come to commit any error, or that we liue otherwife then becometh vs, we must not accuse or blame $\hat{f v}$ meannesse of our country, but justly attribute the fault to our selves. It is true (saith he) that he that hath undertaken to frame a peece of work, or to write any history, in y which many things should be put, not familiar in his countrey, and that they find not alwaies at their hand energy where, but strange for the most part, dispersed here and there, and that must be gathered from many places and divers authors; in truth he must first and before all other things dwell in a great and noble city, full of people, and a great number of men louing goodly and honest things, to the end there may be store of books, and that in searching vp and downe, and hearing them tell with linely voice many things, which other story-writers peraduenture haue left vnwritten, and that hallbeare so much more credit, because they are fresh in memory of the liuing: he may make his work complete and perfect in all things, and not wanting many things that should be necesfary for it. Hauing made this preface, he excuseth himselfe, that he could not profit so much in knowledge of the Latine tongue, as he defired, and sheweth how he did helpe himselfe. But forafmuch as it is in this worke of his Liues that Plutarch hath most shewed his sufficiencie, when ther you consider the length of the worke, or trie with what judgement he hath proceeded: peraduenture it will not be hurtfull to speake somewhat of it, beside that which hath bene spoken by this Translator in the Presace. I do not enter here into commendation of Historie in generall, nor we need not apply that vnto Plutarch, which Cicero and many others have spoken. For if euer there were booke, next to that we call the holy Scriptures, it may be said, that that which containeth the lives of the noble GREEKES and ROMAINES, is an afforced The come & testimony of many hundreds of yeares, a Sunne of verity, a life of memory, a true mistresse mendation of life, and an excellent messenger of antiquity. And as the stone called the Opall, sheweth many Orient colours aboue all other precious stones: so do the Liues of Plutarch make an abridgement of all the best things contained in the Greeke and Latine histories. For there are feene worthy examples of vices and vertues, and infinite number of Maximes, and notable precepts touching the duties of every one, their vertues and vices. Now although Plutareh in the ignorance and blindnesse of the true God, could not (no more then other prophane Historians) touch the true end of hiftory: yet we may note some admirable thing in him in that respect. Since history (which containeth in it an infinite number of particular deedes and honourable actions, as the collection of the lines of Plutarch) is a goodly gliftering glaffe or table, within the which may be discerned the wonders and admirable working of the divine Providence. For to comprehend that well which God and men do, there are three things to be confired in enery history: to wit, the men whereof there is question, the things worthy of memorie, and the circumstances; keeping this ground against the Epicurians and enemies of mans life: That there is a Godhead and supernaturall power which gouerneth and maintaineth the world, things are wherein nothing happeneth by chance, but all is guided by amost wise disposition of the Families, same, for the preservation of families, of civil policie, and of a company and happy congregation that shall be taken out of this world into a better. A wife and learned historian must presented by hauean eye vpon these three things, for to apply them vnto three other vertues that ought to Godiprosishine in him: verity, moderation, and eloquence. For somuch as if he set out sables, or if he talke to no purpose, and make discourses at pleasure, or if he be troublesome in a speech not virtigent, coherent and hanging well together: then he deserueth no more the name of an Historian. As deration, co for these vertues, I do assure my selfethat every man of judgement will agree, that they are readily to be found in Plutarch, accompanied with a fweet granity that alwaies pleaseth the reader, of anhisto. and gineth him at a hundred times reading as good a fauor & tast of him as at the first. Let a man range be and gineth him at a hundred times reading as good a lauor & tait of him as at the first. Let a man book vpon stories that have nothing in them but then ame, & vpon so many books ill composed, Platarch.

Plutarch a discreet

of the which Europe is full: they find that the parts necessarie to be observed in the persons, is nothing at all regarded: that those which thinke to represent others, they do sample them after a strange fashion. Therupon the affections & passions, the hatred, the enuic, euill speaking, false reports, flatteries & lies, present themselves so vntowardly that they mar all. To the contrary, we fee Plutarch very exact in that respect. It sufficeth me to touch the things passing by: whether he shew the vices or vertues of great or meane persons, he doth it in good termes, without aggrauating or making it leffe. He taketh no manner of pleasure to speake euil of any, but wisely hideth that whereof we ought not to speake but with shame and compassion of mans infirmity. And he is more enclined to commend the good in vicious persons, then too much to set open the shops of their wickednesse. But if necessity enforce him vnto it, it is with such manifest proofes. that others which are wicked feeing him wash the head of their companions, they are compelled to hang down their heads, and to condemne their wicked thoughts. Now touching matters Matters re- that ought to be remembred in histories, therein are to be considered, the counsels, executions, and accidents. For counfels, who noteth better then he, the wickednesse of those which aske counfell of the world, of the vnconftant multitude, of men of as litle judgement as themfelues, or of themselves: With what grace doth he lay open the errors committed by Xerxes, Pyrrhus, Ma. rius, and infinite others: And though euill counfell prosper for a time, yet the eternall wisedome hath a fecret intention to bring things to passe, which the wisedome of man cannot see till it be done: as Plutarch doth finely discouer them in the life of Cato V tican, and of others. The executions are of divers forts, according to the workmen and their means. In this point Plutarch is admirable, shewing particularly infinite thoughts in actions which he representeth: so that for one felfe deed he giueth alwaies entrance and direction vnto the studious reader, to make halfe a douzen of fundry rules for the direction of mans life; he was euer fo fortunate to comprehend al things well, and to draw that which was to be offered vnto the view of posterity. If accidents come in question, hee can excellently referre them to the counsels, and draw out goodly instructions for all forts of men. Now there remaineth the circumstances of times, of places, of people, and others so diligently searched in Plutarch, that in this matter he seemeth to have furmounted himselfe. To proue all that hath bene presently spoken in few words, behold here the book lieth open, and vnder the indifferent examination of the learned and vertuous men. I am not ignorant that fome men wel thought of among the learned men of our time, have very boldly cenfured Plutarch, accufing him of ignorance: alfothat he had writtethings incredible fabulous, and that he had made vnapt comparisons. For his ignorance, that hath bene sufficientdefended a ly handled heretofore speaking of Plutarchs toung. And if we must speake of the sufficiencie of an Historian. I thinke it is most excellent in him; howbeit I shall not need to defend him seeing that he defendeth himselse sufficiently well. If he be mistaken in some circumstances, and that they discouer some fault in his memory or of discordance condemned by many other Historians: that deserueth not so sharpe a reprehension. And for all the rest, I will adde to the answer of a noble person, well studied in Plutarchs lecture, for that it sufficeth and fully agreeth with that which we now speake of. And these be his words: If one had spoken simply that Plutareh reciteth things otherwise then they be, it was no great reproch for those things which we have not feene, we take them at other mens hands of credit; and I fee that to his knowledge he reporteth at times one selfe history diversly. As the judgement of three of the best Captaines that euer were given by Hannibal, is otherwise set downe in the life of Flaminius: and contrary againe in the life of Pyrrhus. But to charge him to have taken for ready money things vncredible, and also vnpossible, it is even to accuse for want of judgement, the author of the best judgement in the world. And here is the example which they alledge, to wiff that Plutarch faid, that a child of LACEDEMON fuffered his belly to betorne out by a Foxe he had stolne, & hid under his gown, cuento suffer death rather then to be wray his theft. First of al I find this example very cuill chofen to bound the indeuours of the faculties of the foule, whereas for corporall forces we have more law to limit and know them. For this cause, if I had had to do withall, I would rather have chosen an example of the second fort, and they are lesse credible. As amongst others, that which he reciteth of Pyrrhus: that being hurt as he was, he gaue his enemy armed at all peeces such a blow with his fword, that he claue his head down to the lowest parts, so that the body fell a sunder in two parts. In the other example I find no greater wonder, neither do I like y excuse they make for Plutareb, for that he added too this word (as they fay) to adulfe vs, and to be warie in our cariage and behaviour. For voleffe it be in things received by authority, or in feverence of antiquity or of religion, he would not himfelfe have received nor have made vs beleeve things of themselves incredible. And that this word (as they favo) is not vsed in that place to that puri policis eafle to be judged for that he himselfe reporteth in another place upon the subject of the patience of the children of Laced Amon, of examples that fel out in his time valikelier, to perfinade vs. As that which Cicero alfo hath teftified before him, for that he was (as he faid) enemin the very places; that even til their time there were children, for proof of patience, that were tried before the altar of Diana, who fuffered themselves to be whipped vntil the bloud ran down their Thingsee legs, not onely without crying, but also without weeping, yea and some of them even to death, ming incre-And that which Plutarch telleth with an hundred witheres: that at a facrifice a burning cole being fallen into a boyes fleenes of y. LACED EMONIANS, as he was cenfing, he suffered al his arm tobe burnt, vntil the very fauor of the burnt flesh came to them that were present. There was no. thing according to their custome that did more different them, and for the which they should fuffermore reproch and shame, then to be taken scaling. I am so instructed with the greatnes of these men there, that it seemes to me, that this report which Plutareh made should not be incredible, or not so much as rare or strange. Marcellus also reporteth, touching this matter of thefr. that in his time there could be found no manner of torture or torment how cruell focuer that could force the EGYPTIAN'S taken with theft, (whereunto they were accustomed and hardened once to tel their names. I know that there were certaine poore countri men, in the miferable civill wars, that did endure the frying of the foles of their feet against the fire, and the nipping off their fingers ends, to thrust their bloudy eyes out of their heads, their foreheads being fiftbound with a great cord before they would be ranfomed. I have feene one left starke naked in a ditch for dead, having his necke fwollen with a halter tied about it, with the which they had dragged him at a horfetaile al night long, his body thrust in with a dagger in an hundred places, notio kill him, butto make him full of paine: who had endured all that, having loft his speech and fenses, resoluced (as he told me) to die athousand deaths, rather then to promise any thing. and he was one of the richeft laborers in all the country. We must not judge that which is posibleand that which is not, as it is credible and uncredible to our capacity. It is also a great fault, (mothe which not with standing the most part of men do fall) to make it nice to beleene that thing of another man, which we our felues cannot do. This is that which this person answereth who the objection made, touching the fact of the boy of LACEDEMON fet out to accuse our of another, Platarch ouerthwartly with a lie. The other example which they alledge of incredible things, & altogether fabulous, spoken by Plutarch, is: that Agesilaus was condemned in a fine by the Ephores, because he alone had won the hearts and good wils of all his citizens. I know not what note of falshood they find in that: but so it is, that Plutarch speaketh of things which he should better know then we. It was no new thing in Greece to fee men punished and banished onely for that they were too great with their Citizens: witnesse the Ostracisine and Petalisme. And where they accuse Plutarch, that he did not well for the GREEKES with the ROMAINES: Witnesses, Demosthenes and Cicero, Aristides and Cato, Lyfunder and Sylla, Pelopidas and Marcellus, Agefilaus and Pompey; judging that he favoured the GREEKES, for that hegaue them companions to little refembling them: which is justly to blame Plutareh for that wherin he was most excellent and praise-worthy. For in his comparisons (which is the most admirable part of his works, and in the which (in my opinion) he tooke more delight then in any companyers other of his writings) the fidelity and fincerity of his judgements, equalleth their profoundnes of Greeks and their weight. He is a Philosopher that teacheth vs vertue. Let vs see if we can defend him mainte, from this reproch of malice and falshood. I think that which hath bene the cause of this censure, isthe great shining colour of the names of the Romains which we have in hand. It appeareth not to vs that Demostheres can equal the glory of a Consul, Proconfull, or Quastor of this great comonwealth. But he that shall confider the truth of the thing, & the men in themselves, wherat Plutarch ener most aimed: and to weigh their maners, their dispositions, their sufficiencie and their fortune: I think to the contrary, that Cicero and old Cato are indebted to their companions. For the purpose of this centure, I would rather have chosen the example of the yonger Cato co-Pared vnto Phocion: for in this comparison there might be found a more likely disparitie to the advantage of the Romaine. For Marcellus, Sylla, and Pompey, I see well that their exploits of war are more puft vp, glorious & fumptuous, then those of the GREEKS which Plutarch compareth with them. But the most faire and vertuous actions are not alwaies (no more then in wars) the most famous. I oftentimes see the names of Captaines drowned by the glory of other mens names of leffe merit; witnesse Labienus, Ventidius, Telesinus, and divers others. And to take it from thence, if I were to complaine me for the GREBES, might I fay, that much leffe is Camillus com. parable vnto Themistocles, the Gracchi vnto Agis and Eleomenes, Numa vnto Lycurgus, and Scibio vnto Epaminondas, which were also of his rolle. But it is a folly to judge things on a sudden of fo many men. When Plutarch compareth them, he doth therefore equal them. Who could more eloquently or confcionably note the disparities and differences. Doth he come to compare the victories, the exploits of arms, the power of armies led by Pompey, & his triumphs, with those of Agestlaus? I do not beleeue, saide he, that Xenophon himself if he were aliue, although that they suffered him to write what he would to the aduantage of Agefilaus, durst put him in comparison. Doth he speake to compare Sylla with Ly fander? There is no comparison, said he, neither in num. ber of victories, nor in hazard of battels: for Lyfander wan onely buttwo battels by fea, &c. That taketh away nothing from the ROMAINE. To have fimply presented them to the GREEKS, he could have done them no injurie, what disparity soeuer there might be: neither doth he weigh them also all together in the great there is no preferencie. He hath compared the peeces and cir. cumstances one after another, and judgeth them severally. Wherfore if they wold consince him of fauour, they must vnfold some particular judgement, or to say in general that he had failed to match fuch a GREEK with fuch a ROMAIN because there were others fitter to be compared & of better report. So much for this point. There are other that have blamed § length of Plutarchi discourses, also that he hath mingled many light things, & that he delights to thrust in many verfes of Poets, without any necessity, fay they judging that he did that to lofe no part of his memories, & fo hath confusedly put all peeces together in his work. But that which hath bene spoken of before, answereth this objection. And to accuse Plutarch to have wanted judgement, (hethat hath alwaies bene very discreet in his writings, as he protested at the beginning of his booke of fatall deftiny) is to show himselfe madde, and out of his wits. Those things that men judge to be fmall are not fo alwaies, if they be better confidered of neither is his length fo far out of square and troublefome, neither is that out of the matter, which he interming leth of the Poets, but is spoken to good purpose, & oftentimes upon good ground of aduice in matters of great weight: whereof his worke shall make proofe whosoeuer will examine them without passion.

But now let vs leaue these censors to thinke more adulfedly hereafter what they speake, and come againe to Plutarch: who after his returne to GRECE gaue himselfe more to his bookethen he did before: and notwithstanding he was very old, he made an end of his Liues. And surthermore, continuing still the loue he bare vnto his countrey, he employed himselfe in divers Offices of the commonwealth, whereof he maketh mention also in fundry places of his Morals, and especially in the booke where he instructes the those that deale in the affaires of estate. For he saith there these words: I answer them that reproue me when they find me present in our towne, to fee them measure, and tell bricke, and tile, stones, fand, and lime which they bring; that it is not for my felfe that I build, but for the commonwealth. And in this Treatife, Whether an old man should yet deale in the affaires of estate. Thou knowest (said he, writing vnto Euphanes) that there are many Pythiades, that is to fay, many termes of fine yeares that I do exercise the Priesthood of Apollo PYTHIAN: yet I thinke thou wouldest not fay to me, Plutarch, thou hast facrificed \ enough, thou haft made processions enow, thou hast led many dances, and now that thou art old and ancient, it is time thou leave thy crowne off thy head, and abandon the oracle, because of thy age. At the beginning of the eight question of the fixt booke of his discourse at the table, he mentioneth his Office of being Major of the towns of CHERONEA. To conclude, even to the end of his life he shewed in his deeds, that which he excellently handled in his writings: which is, that there is nothing letteth old men to ferue and profit their commonwealth in divers forts of gouernment, whether it be with good words, with good counfell, with liberty and authority to speake boldly, and with graue respect, as the Poets say. For they are not the seet, nor y hands nor all the strength of the body only, which are the parts & good of the comonwealth but they are first of all and principally the soule, and the beauties thereof as instice, temperance, and wifdom; the which coming late to their perfection, it were to no purpose they should enjoy a house, land, & all other inheritances of his citizens, and that it could receive no more any profit by the for the good of the commonwealth, because of their long time, the which doth not so much depriue deprive them of strength and ability to do service, as it doth increase them with sufficiencie and knowledge of faculties requisite to command and gouerne. Furthermore Platarch having lived alwaies honourably even to old age, he died quietly among his children and friends in the city Phinarchi of CHERONEA, leauing in his writings an immortall fauour of his name vnto posterity. Befides the honour his citizens did him, there was a statue set vp for him by ordinance of the people of ROME, in memory of his vertues. Now furthermore, though time hath deuoured some nort of the writings of this great man, and minished some other: neuerthelesse those which remaine being a great number, haue excellent vse to this day among vs. Howbeit, hauing met with some fragments in Stobess, of some Treaties which are not to be found any more, I thought it would not mislike the reader to cull out some peeces to present them vnto him, to shut vp all this discourse. Wisedome, saith he, (in the booke Of the profite which knowledge of the time to come brin- wisedome, geth) confisteth not in shew, but in affaires, before a man setteth too his hand; and sheweth how he should come before them, and receive them when they be offered him; for it considereth the thingsto come. The body hath no eyes but before, the backe feeth nothing at all:but wifedome v by helpe of memory, feeth cuen the things that are past and gone. It is the Secretarie which alwaies remaineth and abideth within, as Plato faith. It is the part or instrument of the soule which taketh hold of things past, keepeth them, and layeth them vp safe, making a circle, within the which that that is past ioyneth with the thing present, and will not suffer it to extend it selfe beyond compasse, and to passe the bounds of nature and knowledge. Of the booke against pleasure. Pleasure yndoeth the body, and daily maketh it tender by deliciousnesse, the common vie wherof cutteth downe the lustinesse and consumeth the strength, so that weaknesse and sicknesse do abound, and in youth they begin to waxe old. Voluptuousnes is a beast that maketh men slaues, but yet no sauage beast: for if she did openly assaile any body, there would soone be an end:

but she is so much more dangerous, because she hideth her ill courage, and taketh vpon her the wherein habit of good will. We must shun her therefore for two causes, the one, that she should not dangerous. hurt vs, the other, that she should not seduce vs. Let vs no more call voluptuousnesse honest pleasures, but rather acknowledge that they be troubles, services, and duties; and esteeme the rest as hamefull and violent things, which by their diverfity flatter vs, and in the meane time finely burt vs. Now our selues and affaires ought to be subject to the same law that the brute beastes are, to the end that when we have satisfied our defire, we have no new minde to couet further, but that our moderate pleasures be contented when they have things necessarie. Is there any manthat will commend traitours? Now pleasure is cuen such a one: for she betrayeth all that relation and dependeth vpon vertue. Doth any body esteeme hangmen much? See not withstanding what anhangend. itis to follow fenfuality, which tormenteth and renteth afunder all moderate things. Will any man commend auarice? Voluptuousnesse is as vnsatiable as the loue of money. What pleasure can we take of a beast that destroyeth vs by flattery ? Iaske, why doest thou not play the foole and knaue in the presence of all men? To the contrary, thou slyest, and bearest reuerence to the selfe, abusing thy selfe in the night and darknesse which cannot depose against thee. No man seeketh to hide him that doth well, nor is affraid of the light that is round about him: but rather to the contrary, he would althe world were become a bright Sunne, to give light to all the parts of the good works he doth. But if he happen to commit any fault, he doth all his possible indeuour to hide it, and blameth his passion. Now let vs take away the veile, and openly muse vpon these pleasures. They make vs drunke, euento lose our sences: they continually make knaues and drowfie lubbers to follow harlots when they should labour enemies of mans life, neither caring for father nor mother, voide of all reuerence vnto the lawes. In the Booke that treateth, how women should be taught and learned. It is no easie thing to hide this ignorance, suth Heraelitus: and much leffe then when he hath drunke more then ordinary. Plato faith alfo, that the thought is discouered by wine: as much as to say, after a man hath drunk too much. Sophocles bla- of seres. med Æschylus, because he wrote histragedies when he had drunke out of measure: for, saith he, though Afchylus doth well, yet he knoweth not what he doth. Pythagoras being asked how it could be brought to passe, that a drunkard should abstaine from being drunke? If he remembred faid he, oftentimes what he did when he was drunk. It is a commo faying in cuery mans mouth, Let northe child haue a knife. And I say, keepe riches from a child, and ignorance from a man. Of the booke of accusation. Hippias said, there was nothing so intollerable as accusation, because decusaring there was no punishment ordained by law for accusers, as there was for theeues: although they stole friendship from men, which is the goodliest riches a man can have. So that an outrage of fact though it be great, is lesse then accusation, which doth much more hurt because it is hidden. Of the discourse or Epistle of friendship. He is a true witnesse of the truth, that is not bound by he nefit vnto bim that bringeth him forth, and that speaketh before the ludges without exception of person. We must win loue by gentlenesse and bounty, rather then by meanes: and for the commonwealth, wisedome and gentlenesse should be in meaned together. Agripping in his gouernment, attempted to perswaded them whom he condemned to lose goods & life, that it was expedient for them they should be condemned. For, said he, I do not pronounce sentence against you, as a theefe passing by should say, Deliuer thy purse, or thou art dead: but I do that as your tutor, and one that hath a care of you: like vnto the Phisition that comforteth his patient from whom he would cut some member, and perswadeth him to be ruled. Cotis king of THRACIA Was very cruell vnto his subjects: & when one of his familiars told him, That is called fury not kingly gouernment. But foit is, answered the king, that this fury of mine maketh my subjects wife and quiet. of the booke against the strength of the body. Doest thou thinke the strength of the body to be fo great a happine fe, that thou wilt conclude that nature which hath given more french to beafts then to men, should be mother to them, and stepmorher to the other. Does thou think it is by reason of the massimenes or weight, or by the swiftnesse, or strength of the eyes? The true strength of men consisteth in discourse of the soule, by means wher of he hunteth in the forrests. and taketh the Elephants in a fnare; he rideth horse and breaketh them, he bringeth oxen subject to the yoke, he beatern downe birds with bolts, and catcheth with angles fish that lychidden in the bottome of waters. There is his strength which is seene much better, when he considerethat his case, the roundnesse of the earth, the breadth of the elements & the revolutions of the stars. Such were the worthy exercises of Hercules, and who had not rather be Vly ses, then Polyphemus the Cyclopian. Also when one spake much in commendation of a venturous and hardy man. as if he had bene some braue souldier: There is great difference, said Aratus the Sicyonian.he twixt esceming vertue, and regarding life nothing. Of the booke of Dinination. It is most apprarent that from the beginning Necessity invented and polished certain arts, which she doth keepe euen till this present. It is she that hath taught all things. For, is there any thing that necessity hath not thought of: she hath brought forth the occupation of wearing, of building, the art of Physicke, tilling of the ground, & all that belongs vnto it. There be other crafts also found out. I cannot tell by what pleafure: as Perfumers, Apothecaries, Cookes, and others that ferue for ornaments of the body; also Painters. Againe, there are sciences which men feeke, learne, and teach, because of the probable and apparent reason which they discover, and for the beautie of them; as Arithmeticke, Geometrie, and all others confifting in measures and proportions, then Aftrologie. And yet though we contemne them, neuertheleffe because of their excellency, we are conftrained in some fort to know them, faid Plato. Of the Treatie, That love and indgement are dinerfe things. Some fay, that love is the faculty of the foule, which we call understanding: others, that it is a concupiscence or voluptuousnesses, that it is a madnesse: and there are that thinke it is, I cannot tell what divine agitation of the foule: and others that make it a God. This disputation hath made that some haue judged, and rightly, that from the beginning, loue is a fimple defire or luft: but if it exceed, it is furie. Also that friendship doth refemble it. If love be despited, it begetteth melancholie: if it increase as wished, he that is posfeffed withall, hath a thousand conceipts and phantafticall imaginations, and doth imagine all the greatnesse and fauours of heaven and earth. And this is the reason why the Poets say, that love is a Torch: and the Painters, Potters, and Statuaries do represent it in that estate. For that part of the fire which doth give light, is very pleafing, profitable and commodious: but that which burneth, bringeth nothing but trouble and forrow. Like as it is a good thing to reproue and admonish our friends, and such as belong vnto vs, whilest they be in their right wits, and capable of judgement and understanding: so to the contrary, if they be light headed and distraught of their wits, we do not vie then to reason and contest with them, but we rather do yeeld to that they fay. So must we freely and lively reprove them, that commit a fault through choler or couetousnesse: but as for louers, they must be excused because they be sicke. And therefore from the beginning, it were the best way not to suffer loue to take root in them: if it do, repaire then to the altars of the gods that give remedy as Plato faith, that is to fay, keep company with wife me. Drive this beaft farre from thee, before his teeth and nailes do grow: if not, thou must fight with the cuill when it is great and full growne, the which thou didft embrace in thine infancie and youth. But which are these teeth and nailes of loue: Suspicion and Jealonsie. Now some will say The teeth to me that there is also I know not what, a thing that draweth, and is pleasant, So had this famous and nailes sphins wings of diuerse colours, very pleasant to behold: for when be turned them to the beames of the Sunne, they shined likegold; and when he was against the clouds, one would haue faid it had beneazure mingled with yellow and red, like the rainbow in the Element. Loue affer the same fort hath in it (I know not how) a gracious, gentle, and faire shew. But it destroyeth men, ouerthroweth houses, dissolueth mariages, and confoundeth great Captaines, without propounding of hard Enigmaes or questions to be resolued; but himselfe being so taken that he cannot be freed. For example If one asked: What is that which at one instant loueth and hateth. flieth and pursueth, threatneth and prayeth, angreth and flattereth, taketh and leaueth, laugheth and weepeth with a breath; it is a knot which one cannot eafily vndo. Furthermore, the Sphins had many things deuised for pleasure, mingled in the midst of his Enigma. For though an old man go with a ftaffe, yet he hath not three feet; and the litle child is not a beaft with foure feet, although he creepe of al foure, helping his weake legs with his two hands. But there be no fuch Enigmaes in the passions of louers. They loue and hate, defire the thing absent, and seare the thing present they flatter, and do injurie: they die and kill themselves for the thing they love: they defire not to loue, and yet will not leaue to loue: they repent them, and waxe blind: they become wife, and yet cast themselves away: they wilcommand, & yet yeeld themselves slaves. And therfore it is that fuch a paffion is holden for a pure rage; as also Euripides doth confesse it. Now love is not begotten upon a fudden, nor doth not inuade all the person, as choler doth but it kindleth Louenes by litle and litle, as a litle fire. It flippeth in foftly, and when it hath possessed the foule, it dissolves geth not easily: but we see it somtimes lufty and fresh euen in old men that have white haires. If irccase, and begin to coole by succession of time, or that it be dead by some accident, it doth not altogether leauethe foule, or the fubstance of his fire confumed: where the marks of his heat pafsedare to be seene as if lightning had passed thorow there. As for the sorow past, and the choler after it is quenched, there is no foark left in the foule, but they perceive that the inflammation of the passion which made a great noise is quiet; but the bitings of loue, albeit the beast be sone, do not therfore lose their venime, but the inward wounds do renew & refresh themselues again. To be short, no man knoweth what such a passion meaneth, nor how it cometh, nor from whence it flipped into the heart. In the booke where he disputeth for beautie. Are not men compounded of body and foule: Is the one enough for vs without the other: How could that be: For if the body were not gouerned by the foule, it would not liue, and the foule had need of a place to be kept ranifiesh and lodged in. Since then both the one and the other are adorned with gifts proper vnto them. the foule with inflice temperance, and wifedome and the body with force, beauty and health were it not to be wondred at, if one despised that which cocerneth the body, & that he made no reckoning but of the goods of the foule. Corporall beauty is a work of the foule, which maketh aprefent of this gift to the body. For when the foule is gone, there remaineth nothing good in the body. The ftrength, the colour, the fight, and the voice, do vanish. To conclude, the body being abandoned of his ancient inhabitant, there is nothing left that is amiable. Thou therefore that accuses beauty, vnwares thou speakest outrage to y soule, which is cause of this beauty. Aristotle to one that asked him, why a man did loue faire things: answered: It is for a blind man to aske such a question. Diogenes called faire Curtisans, Queenes, because many do execute that which they command. of the booke against Nobility. What do we thinke that Nobility is, but riches gathered together by ancestours, or some honour attained vnto long time before? whereof the one nor the other proceedeth not of our will: but the one commeth by vnconftant Fortune, the other proceedeth from the disorders of the world. So then this proud name of Nobility floweth from two strange springs. Now riches maketh not those that are borne like vnto them: but vertue proceeding from the fincere habitude of the spirit, is planted in the race of the vertuous, and doth make them truly noble. In this is true nobility, to wit: the conformity True nobilivnto vertuous manners. But I pray you, king Midas riches, were they more rich then the it confident pouerty of Aristides? although he left not wherewithall to defray his charges of funerall. To the contrary, king Midas tombe passed for magnificence all the riches of the world: but Nobility is not enclosed in gold nor filter. Vice is rightly compared vnto fire: for when either the one or the other wanteth nouriture, it goeth out. But the basenesse of the race of Socrates the

Seneca.

A knowledge that doth many errors flie: A life relifting vices poisoned breath: A death, in death, that conquerd death by death, O Seneca, are fruits of thy Philosophie.

A PAINE is deuided by the Geographers into three seuerall parts, of y which one of them abutting vpon the straights of GIBRALTAR and the Mediterrane sea, called by Straho TVR DITANIA, was in old time the best inhabited. And albeit he doth confine it into two thousand furlongs in compasse, yet he faith that in his time they made account of two hundred townes within that circuite, which at this day is called ANDALYZIA, having taken the name of the VANDALS, which have dwelt there since the ruine of the Ro-

MAINE Empire. In this part of Spaine was (and yet is) situated upon the river called of the ancients Bætis, and at this day Guadalquibir, (that is to fay, the great river, by reason of his long course) the city of Cordve E, or Cordov E, which was in old time one of the most famous cities of Spaine, built by Marcellus, and inhabited with noble Romaines, as Plinie and Strabo do witnesse. This place amongst others was a feed-plot or garden of good spirits, and mengiuento studie. Among other honourable families of that time, was that of the Anneans, which

helides their nobility loued learning, specially fince the father of Seneca, whose life now we senecassa. write. He was a fimple gentleman bearing no charge in the commonwealth, for that he had no foirit in him to embrace such burthens, and gaue himselfe most to learning, although otherwise he left not his sword, being a knight as many other PATRICIAN's in the province where he was. With his armes he joyned the profession of learning, but specially of eloquence, in the which he excelled the most in his time. He maried a Lady called Elbia, of whom he had three Hubraline. sonnes, the eldest bearing the name of the father, to wit, Lucius Annans Seneca. The second. Anneus Nonatus, afterwards called Iulius Gallio. The third, Annaus Mella, father of Lucan the Poet. The father was very carefull to have his children well taught and brought vp.but the eldest especially, who with time gaue himselfe wholy vnto Philosophy. For Gallio besides his learning, he was raised up to some publicke dignities at Rome. Mella on the other side, he cared not for advancement, and therein he followed his father, as we will shew hereafter more at large. Seneca, of whom we have presently to speake, was borne as it should seeme, a litle be- in what fore the death of Angustus Cafar. For himselfe writerh in the hundred and ninth Epistle vnto Lucillius, that he was a young man when by the commandement of Tiberius the ceremonies of the strangers religions were driven out of Rome: the which Cornelius Tacitus in the second booke of his Annales said to have happened in the fift yeare of Tiberius. But of this we will feake more hereafter, treating of the writings of Seneca. Furthermore, the occasion why himfelfe and his brethren came out of Spaine to Rome, was this. About the tenth yeare of the reigne of Tiberius Empire, matters began to be troublesome in diverse parts of the dominion of Rome, by reason of the cruelties and insolencies of this Prince: who having about him Seianus, and some other dangerous Counsellers, he shewed his disposition more then before. The sicknesse of the head sloweth into all the principall members: so that the provinces were left without gouernours, orelse were tyrannized by Prætors: whereupon followed great alterations. SPAINE amongst others, in many places fined as they listed; it was managed at that time by exactors, which caused people to rebelland enter into factions. It chanced amongst others, that L.Pifo Prætor, was killed by a TERMESTAN, because he caried himselfe tyrannously amongst the people. This TERMESTAN being caught by the backe, and cruelly tortured, he shewed himfelfe so frout not with standing, that they could not possibly make him confesse any of his asso. of a Spaniciates. But being quickly dispatched by the hands of the hangmen, who would have put him to anew torture, he knocked his head against a stone with such force, that he died presently in the field. Shortly after the cities began to be warie of their yoake, and Cor Dov n specially among others, which being of the principallest and of great importance, an army was sent thither vnder the conduct of Cneus Domitius Anabarbus, who having subdued Cordove, tooke amongst others Seneca, his two brethren, and Lucan his nephew, their father being dead some yeares before. Domitius knowing what men they were, he fet them at liberty, and did so much that he perswaded them to leave Spaine and go to Rome, as well to continue and to advance their studies well begun, as to be knowne and honoured with publicke office. Now the state of Spaine was such at that time, that Seneca and his were easily perfwaded and won by him that had authority ouerthem, and at the last they went into ITALY. Somethinkethat Annaus Mella remained still in Spaine, being a man that loued to liue privately, and that made no account of the honour and vanity of the world. For his sonne Lucan, he was brought very young after his two vnckles, who did heare at Rome Pomponius Marullus, Iulius Higinus, Cestius and Asnius Humasters Gallus in Rhetoricke: and in Philosophie, Socio Alexandrinus, and Photinus a Stoicke, very famous. Vnder which they all profited, and Seneca specially, who ioyning to the gravity of the doctrine of the Stoickes, a compendious and fententious speech, in short time made himselfe to be knowne.

Now having remained a space shur vp in schooles, or hidden in the company of some learned men, whom he harkened vnto, and familiarly frequented, he was put forward at the beginning of the Empire Caligula, by Cneus Domitius (who had maried Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, and litle daughter of Tiberius, of whom Nero was borne, nine moneths before the death of Tiberius) and began to shew himselfe openly, pleading before the Senate with great grace: for from that time forth he was esteemed for one of the wisest and most eloquent men of Rome. By meanes whereof his credit increased from day to day. But as prickes be hidden vnder roses, and where men thinke to winne honour, oftentimes they get repulse and Kkkkk4 contempt: the revolution of mens affaires flourishing, yet marvellous brittleand subject to fall. So Seneca proued that his eloquence profited others more then himselfe; and that as sometimes it is a wifer part to keepe the fword in the scaberd, then in the hand: euen so The hire of Glence doth no danger threate. The Emperour Califula was a Prince that cared little for liberall sciences, yet he was very enrious to speake well, having words at commandement, and esteemed eloquent among others: specially if sometime he disposed himselfe to speake against any man, the words and whole sentences did increase in his mouth, with such an accent and gesture, that they heard him and knew him afarre off, and sometimes he threatned men with the force of his tongue. This quicknesse and vaine eloquence of his, made him (besides that he had an ill shaped head) wonderfull prefumptuous. For there was neuer a learned man and eloquent in all the Romain E Empire, buthe would prefer himselfe before him. And those which directly or indirectly went about to crosse him, they did put themselues in manifest danger: witnesse that which happened to the Orator Domitius Afer, and vnto Seneca. Caligula bearing ill will a long time vnto Domitius for some light spite he had vnto him, Domitius was accused before the Senate: where Caligula made a long oration written, and therein layd open all his sufficiencie, to shew himselfe better able then Domitius, esteemed one of the best spoken men at that time. Now his purpose was topper Domitius to death, if he had studied to answer eloquently. But Domitius easily discouring this dangerous refolution, made no reply, nor excused himselfe, but said he was assonied at the oration of the Emperour: and faining that the babling of Caligula had raufhed him, he made a briefe repetition, as if he had come thither to hearken. Then having magnified his discourses. and being commanded to defend himselfe, he began to lament, and to craue grace, and kneeling downe befought Caligula, being more afraid of his word then of his hand. Caligula wonderfull joyfull of this honour, and thinking to be eloquence it felfe, received Domitius into grace. Senecataking no heed otherwise to that matter, and having at that time the free spirit of the Stoickes, within few dayes after he fell almost into the like perill or greater danger then Domitius: he knew that Caligula did beare him ill will, and did also speake euill of him amongst his friends; and did compare him in his talke to grauell or fand without lime, as if he would have fayd, that there was neither good band or confequence in Senecaes discourse. And to conclude, that he was but a langler. But Seneca being carried away with the glory he had wonne, which pleased him well, continued notwithstanding to be in the Senate. Insomuch that one day having a cause to pleade before Caligula, he behaued himselfe with such a grace and vehemencie, that all that heard him esteemed him more then they did before, Caligula onely excepted: who being vexed, and as it were pierced through with cloquent words of Seneca, (he having in the meane time let fall no word to offend Caligula, but went on roundly with his matter) he was euen at the point to put him to death, and then had executed his thought, had it not bin for a woman he kept, who perswaded him nor to do it, affuring him that Seneca had a disease that would foone dispatch him out of the world. But after that, Seneca forbare, knowing with whom he had to deale. And soone after Caligula being slaine by Cherca, and Iulius Sabinus his vnkle (sonne of Drusus and of Livia) called Claudius, was chosen Emperour, arthe beginning Sencea came againe into his former credit and fame, and continued it for some yeares: but at the last he was banished Rome for this cause. Claudius was a Prince of small judgement, and caried by certaine minions and parasites of the Court, and by his wife Messalina, one of the most shamelesse women that euer was. This woman wholly possessing Claudius, caused men and women of all qualities to be put to death and banished, as she thought good: and those about all others that went about to hinder the course of her strange waies. Among others she did beare Iulia the daughter of Germanicus ill will, (as Dion reporteth) because Iulia did not regard nor flatter her. Furthermore Iulia was a very faire Lady, which made Messalina icalous, who by litle & litle, found the meanes to accuse this Lady of many crimes, and specially of adultery: and made her be banished, then put to death immediatly after. Seneca was caried away with this tempest, as culpable of the faults pretended against Iulia. Some thinke that Iulia is this Agrippina mother of Nero, whom Claudius maried after the death of Meffalina, and that she was banished, from the Court but for a time onely. The which is very likely, as also Cornelius Tacitus seemeth to incline to that opinion. But for Seneca, it is not onely in one place, but in many, that Dionand others doe accuse him, that he had bene somewhat bold with Agrippina, as if the credit he had in the house of the late deceafed Cnew Domitius, had given him the boldnesse to defile the bed of his benefactor, deadea little before Tiberius. Furthermore, he was banished into the Ile of Conse. where he remained about two yeares: during which time he earneftly disposed himselfe to the studie of Philosophie, with singular contentment and quietnesse of mind, as may be gathered our of the goodly discourse he wrote, & sent vnto his mother Helbia, who did hardly beare this influent banishment of his. But he did comfort her, and by lively reasons showed her, that his entertainement was not grieuous vnto him, but that Philosophy had strengthened him after an excellent fashion, against all the assaults of Fortune. Whilest he was in this profitable solitarinesse. Meffaling continued in her wantonnesse with such an impudent and hote furie, that without the testimony of so many worthie historians, it were impossible to believe that the wife of an Emperour durft once have thought to have committed the thousandth part of the villanies vino the which she had given her selfe over to the fight and knowledge of all the world. In so much as Messalina in the end in the day time, within Rome, in presence of many persons of quality, & in the fight impudently of all the people, Claudius being no further off then Hostia, she maried with great pompe an adulterer called sillius, a gentleman of Rome, with all accustomed ceremonies and solemnities. She made a feast, and held Silius for her husband. Tacitus in his Annales reporteth these things at large. Now though Claudius was fo foolish before, and then too, that he perceived not that which all others faw so openly: in the end being wakened by Narciffus one of his minions, he put Sillius to death, and fome others culpable of this strange excesse. And for Meffaling, the had almost come againe into grace, but in the end she was killed by the comman- Mesfaling dement of Narcisses. After Messalina was executed, the three minions of Claudius, to wit. Narcissus, and Pallas, they layed their heads together to give their master a wife. But in the end Pallas, that pleaded for Agrippina the widow of Cneus Domitius, litle daughter of Tiberius, the daughter of Germanicus, and neece of Claudius, caried it from them; the reasons he propounded had so much more force, being accompanied with dainty sugred words: who vnder the colour of a kinfwoman, came often to visit her vnkle, and she stattered him so brauely, that the being preferred before others, and not yet maried, the did already vie the authority and power of a wife. And out of hand, immediatly after the mariage was folemnized with her vnkle Claudius, she advanced Domitius Nero her sonne, and the son of Cneus Domitius. Furthermore by Agrippina her practifes, Ottavia the daughter of Claudius, and of Messalina, betrothed vnto Sillanus, was promiled and afterwards given vnto Nere for his wife. Who being yet very yong when his mother maried Claudius (and but eleuen yeares old onely) it was in question to get him a good master row, and and tutor to teach him his booke betimes, and to traine him vp in affaires of estate. Agrippina, trothed to awoman of a maruellous spirit, and that plotted great things, as the effect shewed afterwards, Nero as Tacitus hath wisely noted: she resolued to have Seneca called backe againe, and immediatly obtained his grace of the Emperour. She did this to diverse ends, the one was to have a man ofgreat authority and bringing vp about her fonne, to the end to maintaine Nero under the fluadow offo great an appearance, vntill the time of his advancemet were come. The other to make the remembrance of Messalinathe more odious, who had bene the cause of the banishment of Seneca: to put backe Brittanicus, the fon of her, and brother of Octavia, & by that meanes to have men at her comandement, litle affected vnto Claudius. So then Agrippina ouer-ruling Claudius at fent for quickly, & he returned to Rome with great honor, to the contentment of high and low. Immediatly after he was arrived, Claudius received him graciously, made him a Senator, and installed him in his charge. Afterwards being called into the pallace of the Emperour Domitius Nero is given himin charge, with great promises of Agrippina, who had two vices common to fuch persons. The one was, that she was set on fire with extreme couetousnesset money, master. vnder colour that she layd a foundation in store to helpe to maintaine her estate. The other, that Agripping, the gauelargely vnto those whom she knew meete for the advancement of her sonne, whom she would raisevp to be Emperor what soener it cost her, yea were it her owne life; as appeared by her answer to a wise man whom she had asked what should become of the future greatnesse of her sonne Nero. For that he having answered her, that he might be Emperor, but it should be to her vindoing: Let me dye then, faid she, so he may reigne. Tacitus writeth that Agrippina thought the people would rejoyce at the returne of Seneca, because of the great same of his knowledge; and also procured this good, to the end that the infancie of Domitius might

He to the contrary, thinking he had found the meanes to shew the effects of a Philosopher (the wit of man, yea of the wifeft, is so snared in darknesse youndarknesse, when there is question of the troubles of this life) went and engaged himself in the service of Agrippina. And although for a time he bridled the youth of Nero, and did withstand certaine disorders, yet in the end he was constrained to leave al, and suffer the fierce streame to runne, having defired (but too late) solitarinesse: and with lesse goods and honours of the world, more liberty, and quietnesse of mind. Now, as he himself knew very well, and did excellently teach it vnto others, that so as Migrims and paines in the head are not healed by a crowne or royal band, neither to the contrary, is good health, nor the good state of a man lost, though he be not a great Lord: so this greatnesse in the which he faw himfelf highly lift vp in a short time, did nothing else but increase his cares, wherwith he found himselfe bound, as with strong chaines to the end of his life. And though hedid shake them, and at times had proued to breake them, yet he could not possibly vnloose them: and in the end there was no way but he must perish under the weight

Of massie chaines, that of no iron were,

But fuch as [hamefastnesse, did make him beare. It is true, that at the first this charge and gouernement seemed light vnto him. For Nero was a yong Prince of great hope, & in youth he shewed himself gentle, tractagle, obeying his schoolemasters instructions, who delighted to manure this plant, hoping all the world should have joy of him. But as the Emperors that were before, even in their young age, had made fom shew of that which might be expected of them in time to come: Seneca also perceived through the goodly apparence of his scholer, some part of his wild, naughtie, and vntoward nature, which he shewed within few yeares after. Also Cneus Domitius his father, as some came to gratifie him for that Agrippina his wife had brought him a sonne: he holding downe his head, answered, that they should not thinke that of him and of such a woman should be borne an infant, but to the ruine and confusion of the Empire. This prediction was not noted, but when Agrippina her felfe felt by the loffe of her life, what a child fhe had brought into the world, and advanced by fo many strange practises, and by the degrees of incest, of bloud, and filthinesse, vnto the Imperiall dignity. Now whileft Seneca imployed himselfe to polish the spirit of Nero, and sought to print in his heart the loue of vertue, Agrippina carefull of the worldly greatnesse of her sonne, the followed her purpose, cunningly helping her selfe (as much as the thought fit, to serue her turne) with the counsell of Seneca, whom the acquainted not but with the least part of the corruption of her intentions: for the being a cruell woman, and that never received those into fauour whom she hated, caused Lolia Paulina to be put to death, that had reasoned against her for the mariage of Claudius. She caused Calpurnia to be banished out of ITALY. And having through Pallas credit, who prinarly gouerned her, and also kept her, made her sonne Neroto be adopted, who was preferred before Britannicus the right fuccessour vnto the Empire: to the end the would have her power and authority to be knowne to the friends and allies of the Empire, the caused anumber of fouldiers of the old bands and people to be caried to the place where she was borne, a towne of the VBIANS, at this day called CVLLEN, vpon the Rhein. So that this city was afterwards, and is at this present called Colonia Agrippina. Afterwards, for a new testimony of this authority, Caractacus King of England, was led prisoner vnto ROME, and presented with his wife and brethren vnto Claudius: who in presence of the people and of his guards pardoned them. This king and his traine went the fame time before Agrippina (who was fet vpon a feaffold joyning vnto that of her husbands:) they did her reuerence, and thanked her with the same praises they gaue the Emperour. Which was found very strange and new against the custome and fashion of the doing of the ancients: to see a woman set amongst the standards and ensignes of the Romaines. But she maintained that she was a companion of the Empire obtained by her predeceffors. Now those were but slight approches in comparison of this that followeth. For having caused her some to be declared to be of sufficient age, in testimony whereof he tooke the robe due vnto those that were come to mans

Besides all this, there was great largesse made vnto the people in his name, and a summe of mony given ment to the to enery fouldier. Also Nero himselfe passing on to go to the plaies of Circes, went apparelled Empire. with an Imperial robe, and Britannicus as he was wont: who remembring fomany outrages as they had done vnto him, could not containe but must shew some discontentment. And this ferued Agrippina her intention: for the prevailed so much with Claudius, that the procured him to banish or put to death all the gouernours of his sonne Britannicus. And worseyet; he committed him vnto men suborned by Agrippina; who passing further yet, discharged Lucius Geta of his Captaineship of the guard, and Ruffus Crispinus, servants of the house of Messalina, and placed in their roomes, Burrus Afranius, a man greatly esteemed for a warriour, but who knew well enough by whose fauour he was aduanced. Such was the boldnesse of this grippina, a great Lady in truth (for she was the daughter, fifter, wife, and mother of an Emperour) but of a fpirit compounded of all forts of mischiefes. We have touched these things paffing by vpon the occasion of Seneca: who being occupied about his pupill, was constrained to be partaker of many counfels, of the which he understood northe depth alwaies. But so it Sented is, that Agrippina serued her turne much by his authority, to aduance her businesse: the which Senera perceived well, but he could not remedie it for he thought of it too late. Now touching depth of Nere, although the free admonitions of his mafter were barres to keepe him in order, yet the derippinate corruptions of that time, and the working of his mother also, began by litle and litle to appeare in him; fo that by time he made it manifest, that the good instructions had beaten his eares a little, and troubled his braine somewhat: but that euill had taken too deepe roote in his heart. Furthermore, whilest Nero remained so as vnder the rod, openly there could be noted in ... grippina nothing but feuerity and gravity, no infolencies in her house, otherwise then she thought might serue for the advancement of her affaires: for then, her selfe, as also all her traine, gaue themselues over to all dissolution. Now after she had advanced a part of her intentions, Nero being fixteeneyeares old, maried Octavia the daughter of Claudius: and to flew that he had learned under seneca, he pleaded many causes of importance unto the Senate, with the praise of all men. Immediately after, a matter happened, that compelled A. grippina to looke aduifedly vnto her affaires. Claudius having drunke well at a feast, let these words escape him, that his destinie was first to endure all the mischiefes of his wives, and afterwards to punish them. She being afraid to be preuented, determined to make hast, after she had first destroyed Lepida her cosen germaine, who wanne the heart of Nero by her kindnesse and liberality. These troubles of Agrippina gaue Narcissus the alarme, and made him joyne with Britannious. But in these stirres Claudius was poysoned by a woman, an Eunuke of his, and Claudius his physicion, practised of long time by Agrippina; who having disdained Britannicus and his response fifters a long time, fuddenly the gates of the pallace were opened, and Nero accompanied with makes the Burrus presented himselfe to the souldiers PRETORIANS, of whom being saluted Emperour, of busing the souldiers Presented in the s he was confirmed by decree of the Senate, and afterwards allowed by the Prouinces. Then Agripping Nero made diverse orations penned by Seneca, who besides the contentment he had of the high dignity of his pupill, wrote a pleasant discourse vpon the death of Claudius, and did intitule it, Apocolokyntholis, that is to fay, immortality gotten by mushrommes: because the meate was fprinkled all ouer with mushrommes, whereof Claudius was poyfoned. The which Nero afterwards called the meate of the gods, feeing that by that meanes his father in law was scraped out of the world, and made one of the gods after the fashion of the ROMAINES. Also Gallio Senecaes brother gaue Claudius a mocke, faying that he was drawne vp to heaven with a

this equall and common greatnesse, they had both alike power and authority, but by diverse meanes. Burrus, he disposed of all matters militarie, and was a graue man, but had soure maners. Seneca with a pleasant and comely fashion taught this yong Prince eloquence. They did carefully helpe one another, & often conferred together what meanes they should vie to make Ne. ro loue vertue, whereof he seemed to have great beginnings. To hold him in more casily, they let him haue his owne will in exercises and honest pleasures, and left him to his disposition to do as he thought good. This yong man from his infancy vsed his wit, which was quicke to diuerse things, peraduenture better for a man of some other quality, to wit: to graue, to paint, to fing, to play on the citherne, to ride horses, and to make verses. That a Prince haue all these parts in him, and be furnished with others, is not athing in it selfe to be blamed, so that the principall do alwaics go before, and that nothing be forgotten requifite for discharge of his gouetnment received of God. Otherwise, as he was justly reproued, that of a wise Phisition was becomean cuill Poet: and sometime a great Lord was blamed for that he was too good a Mussitian; also it was said to a king, that would contest against a player on the flute: that it was not his craft: so they may answer him that would describe the praises of a Prince: He was a good player at tennis, a cunning workeman, a braue fencer, a fine dancer, a great talker: My faire friend, thou doeft as if one being about to speake of a man and his contentment, came to tell vs that he handleth his feete and his hands finely, and that he hath fine shooes on, and weareth his hatgallantly: and thou forgest bodies without a soule, and men without vocation, and vocations ridiculous. Agefilans hearing one call the king of Persia, agreat king: Why, faid he, is he greater then my selfe, vnlesse it be that he is inster then I am? Nothing surely maketh Kings and Princes truly great but inflice. Other things how exact focuer they are found, they shall oftentimes meete with more excellent in a poore crafts man hand, hidden amongst the refule of the people. The Prince therefore is not defirous of true honour, nor a man that deferueth praise, that is carefull to cloath his body sumptuously, and that glorieth to be a painter, a gratter, a cunning workman, a finger, a player at tennis, a hunter, a dancer, and that his house be richly furnished with houshold stuffe, and himselse daintily served: and all this whilehe giueth no order for his speech, his company, and conversation, that therein he be graver and wiser then a base and common person, making no account to have the pallace of his soule royally apparelled and set forth, as appertaineth to a royall magnificence. But how can a Princebe great, what power of authority focuer he haue, if he beginen to vilethings, vn worthy of histrue greatnessee and worsethen that, if he joyne vice vnto these ridiculous things in him? Away with this trash, and take vertue from a great man in the world, you shall see him litle in all other things. Litle in his gifts and prefents: because he will not, or knoweth not how to dispose them. Litle in paines, because of his delicatenesse: litle towards God, because of his superstition: litle vnto the good, because of his enuie: litle vnto men, because of his cowardlinesse: litle among women, because he is subie & vnto voluptuousnesse. For like as euill workemen. which fet vp litle statues vpon great and large bases, do by measure shew the smalnesse of their statues: eucn so when Fortune lifteth vp to high estate a man of a weake and litle heart, where he is to be seene of all the world; and in the place of the robe and staffe of iustice, he is seene appareiled like a crafts man, or an enterlude player: she doth discouer, descrie, and dishonour him, making it appeare how he recleth & flumbleth for his lightnesse. Let this be spoken to the purpose of Nerves pastimes, who shortly after left all such comedies, to play terrible tragedies. And for his small pleasures, although at the first Burrus and Seneca were warie that this yong Princeliued modestly enough: yet we must confesse that sometime they gaue him liberty to entertaine women, which the estate of his court of Rome did offer him at pleasure. But that which most troubled them, was the boldnesse of Agrippina: who being set on fire with all the paffions that may be found in a wicked gouernment, had peare about her pallace an arrogant man, and that having forgotten with what condition he came to mount foligh, braued all the world, and Nero himfelfe: who notwithstanding his youth, did very vnpatiently beare the insolencie of this minion. And yet he bare it, because he would not anger his mother, to whom he spared no reuerence, honour, and kindnesse amongst his Lords: also he called her his good mother, even to give this name otherwhile for a watch-word vnto the Captaine. In these beginnings Nero made many goodly and well penned orations, after the maner of Seneca, who had a gentle spirit, and meete for the cares of the time. These exercises fashioned fashioned Nero, kept vnder his wild nature, and framed it to the affaires of estate: in such fort, that the first fine yeares of his Empire, he was so finely handled by Seneca, seconded with Burrus, that the affaires of peace and warre prospered, every man having great hope of Nero, who served we flewed himselfe lowly, and given to vertue. Seneca reporteth wonders in his bookeshe did dedicate vnto him, where he treated of clemencie, fingularly of this gentlenesse of his. For at the beginning of the fecond booke he fayth, that Burrus defirous to hang two theeues, fued to the Emperour to fer too his hand, against whom, and for what causes this execution should be done. This being put off diverse times, Burrus follicited the dispatch, and being angrie, presented the paper vnto Nero: who with a discontented countenance, and doing it as a gainst his will, he cried out. By my will, I would I could neither write nor reade. See to what end the instruction of Seneca served: where I will tell you another storie, although it chanced a long time after the first, to shew the credit of the maister towards his scholer. Nero having made a pauilion with eight panes wonderfull fumptuous, Seneca told him: Thou hast shewed thy selfein this pauilion that thou art poore: For ifthou lose it: thou shalt neuer haue the like againe. As it came to passe: for the ship wherein his paulion was, was cast away; and Neroremembring Senecaes words, didbeare the losse of it more patiently. Furthermore, Seneca accompanied Nero in the affemblies of Counfell, and oftentimes told him in the field what he should do, according to the occurences: and in diverse orations he procured that Nero made protestation of his gentlenesse before the Senate. The which turned to the praise of Seneta, in such fort notwithstanding that the people perceived it, and reioyced at it. So they report that the Emperor Traian was wont to fay, that all the other Princes were farre from the first fine yeares of the Empire of Nero: as Tacitus and others do testific. In the meane time Nero shewed himself very liberall vnto Seneca, and did esteeme him as much, or more, then any man in Rome at that time: for he made him a prefent of great fummes of money, vnto three thousand Sestertium, which fome thinke do amount vnto feuen millions and 50000 crownes; of the which, part of it yeelded him great profite at vsurie: the other part was bestowed upon sumptuous gardens, houses of pleasure, lands & possessions farre off and neare Rom E: and furthermore, a pallace in the city, ful of all forts of precious moueables. For all this Seneca waxed nothing the prouder, but fearing Seneca in fortune, and remembring his old state and condition, sought to keepe himselfe vpright in the prosperite middeft of the great combats which were like to come, having vpon his armes the vnconftant vourb of New the which in fight began to runners his defendion, on the other file. youth of Nero, the which in fight began to runneto his destruction: on the other side, the am- of addersits bition of Agrippina to fight withall and beatedowne: this woman being of luch a spirit, that she could tarry in no place, but fet her felfe and others on worke. But this credite of Burrus and of Seneca, and their great riches also, especially of Seneca, made them to be enuied of many, that did blame and accuse them openly. Wherupon seneca opposed the grauity of his maners, and sought by diverse writings to strengthen himselfe more and more : as some of his workes, specially the discourse of a happie life, seemeth to be done by him during these alarmes.

Now the beginning of these grices of Seneca, came partly for that he perceived Nerves mind fo corrupted, that he began to be very dissolute: and partly also for that he discouered that Agrippina and her minions would fet vpon him and Burrus also, which with time would bring them into many dangers. And though for his owne part he was resolute against all accidents. neuerthelesse the charge and care he had of the affaires of the Empire, and the loue which he bare vnto Nerohisscholer, troubled him exceedingly. Neuerthelesse as hope entertaineth vs in all dangers, attending better, he determined to keepe himselfe vpright as long as he could possible, and to expect some other issue in the affaires. Nero was enamoured on a bond woman called Atte, which his familiars did endure, alledging they must suffer one euill, for feare a worse should happen; and that so long as he should fatisfie himselfe with her, he unince should not runne after the Ladies of Rome. But Agripping that could not beare with this in- suffered to folencie, beganto takevphersonne roundly, thinking she could by her magistralitie remedie this well inough. To the contrarie, this was to kindle the fire, and to embrace it altogether in this girle. Nero being waxen great, and counselled by Otho and Claudius Senecio, who made the messages of Loue, he snuffed arthese reprehensions, and began to despise his mother: who on the sudden came to change her subtilities. And she had not beene so sharpe be- flame. forein rebuking, but she was now as gentle in yeelding, and offered her closet to her sonne for the accomplishing of his desires. This sudden change made Nero and his minions thinke much of it, infomuch as they prayed him to beware of the deceipts of this woman that practifed in her heart some villanie, Nero countermining her, presented his mother with many richiewels and apparell of great price. But the being suspicious as could be possible. gaue them injurious words that brought them. Wherewith Nere being offended, and knowing that Pallas was the chiefe counfellour of Agrippina, tooke his offices from him which were committed to him by the Emperour Claudius. Agrippina began then to diminish in reputation, and to flye off the hookes: and comming to Nero himselfe threatned him to take his Empire from him, and to establish Britannicus, the lawfull successour of Claudius. and hereupon detefted in express the wickednesse she had committed, to bring up a fonne that was fo ynthankfull vnto her: adding moreouer that she would goe finde out the armies with Britanniens, fo long as they should see on the other side, this baggage fellow Burrus, and this banished pedanticall companion Seneca (so did she qualifie him) barking after the government of the world. These threatnings were accompanied with such strange counte. nances and imprecations; that they troubled Nero; besides that Britannicus came now to be fourteene yeares old: and that one day playing, he could fay alond before Nero himselfe. that they had taken his Empire from him. Shortly after Britannicus was poyfoned, and died suddenly, to the great assonishment of Agrippina and of Octavia also. Afterwards, Nero defifted to converse fo privately with his mother as he did at other times, and began to giue eare vnto them that would fet them further at oddes: fo that a certaine foole called Park. having told Nero one night that Agripping conspired against him, he was resolved to make his mother to be put to death, and to take from Burrus the charge of Captaine of the guards. But Seneca kept him from that, and after some reasons passed betweene them, Burrus being fent for, to put Nero by his choler, he befought him to let him have the charge of this bufinesse, assuring him that he would put Agrippins to death, if she were continued of any villanic. Notwithstanding that every body should be heard speake in their desence, and about all, a mother; adding also that the accusers were not present, and that there was but one accufer suspected. And that he could not instifue, that such an important deliberation should be made by night, and at the table; and that all that would shew his rashnesse and folly more then any other thing. Nero being fomewhat pacified, they taryed till day, that they might go to the mother, to know how these accusations fell our. Burrus was thereby expresse commission with Seneca, and some others, to marke what should be sayd. But is grippina could so well instifie her selfe, that her accusers were punished: for one of them was put to death, and the rest banished. From that time forward Nero began to runne riot, as is described by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Dion. But the beginning of new and horrible miseries, (the other that went before being but light in respect of them) was the falling in loue with Sabina Popea, the wife of otho, who had taken her away from her first husband Russus south saling Crifpinus, a knight of Rome. Nero did the like vnto this Otho, and tooke from him this minxe that knew the trickes of the occupation. She having gained Nero in a little space, prevailed fo much with him, that he determined to put his mother Agrippina to death. Who hearing of the ill will her fonne did beare her, fought by all meanes to get into his fauour againe: cuen to present her selfe so shamefully vnto him, that I shame to be thereporter of that which the historians speake of her. This notwithstanding he perseuered in his determination, and commanded Anicetus Generall of the galleys of MISENE, to fee her drowned: the which was executed in some fort, yet Agrippina for that time escaped being hurt, and got to a house of pleasure of hers. Nero hearing these newes, more dead then alive, thinking he was vindone, fent prefently for Burrus and Sensca to have their advice: and we cannot tell (faith Tacitus) whether they were of counsell and privile to this fact, or not. Both of them therfore were a great while and spake not a word, being afraid they should lose time, if they about put. Should goe about to dissingle Nero from that which he was purposed to redouble vpon her: and they knew well that the day was come, that Wero must needs dye, if Agrippina were not preuented. Seneca, who vntill this prefent time was cuer ready to speake, looked vpon Burrus, as to know of him if he thought good to commaund the men of warre to doe this murther. Burrus answered, that the PRETORIAN fouldiers were so affectioned to the house of the Cafars, and did fo much reverence the memorie of Germanicus, that they would never enterprise any thing against the life of his children : and that Anicetus was to performe his promise,

SENECA!

Who without any further thought, demanded and excepted the commission, which was foorthwith executed, and Agripping put to death in her house; where she thrusting out her body to the Centener, who tooke his sword in his hand to kill her, she crieth out: Ventrem feri, de- death, firing that the wombe which had borne fuch a fruite as Nero, should be first stricken, and runne through. Nero defiled with this execrable murther, added thereto other infinite abhomina- Nerowas. tions, specially the putting away and doing his wife Octavia to death, a vertuous Princesse, eth worse and that deferued better. Now this is inough that we have touched these things by the way, because they specially concerne the life of Wero, who payed his maister with an cuill reward, entangling him in such wicked counsels. On the other side also it cannot be denied, that Burrus and Seneca yeelded too much to the cruell will of this Paricide. And as for the extremitiethey feared, there were meanes inough to have holpen it: and we must never do cuill, that good may come of it. And what good could come of fuch an execrable abhomination: For though Agrippina deserved such a cruell punishment, for so many wicked deeds as she had done, yet should not her sonne haue had his hand in it; and his counsellers should not haue confented vnto it, nor Anicetus haue executed it. As all were much to be blamed for this deed, yet fome more then other fo they had all their turne, as Tacitus and Suctonius do shew particularly: Burrus dislodged the first, and as least to be blamed for so many disorders, he was spared, in that he faw not the other incredible confusions that fell out afterwards. His throate swelling within, by little and little, he died, his pipes being stopped that he could fetch no wind. Many Burren diaffirmed, faith Tacitus, that by the commandement of Nero, making as though they would eth. helpe him, the pallate of his mouth was rubbed with poyfon and that Burrus perceived that wickednesse, & when Nerocame to see him, he would not vouch safe to looke on him, but turned on the other fide. And Neroasking him how he did, he answered onely, I am well. This man was wonderfully lamented of the Romaines, because of his vertue, and of the foolishnesse of one of his successours, and of the notable villanies of the other called Tigellinus, who was the vtter ruine of Nero. The death of Barrus much impaired the power and authority of Seneca: forthat the meanes to do good were weake, as having loft the halfe part of their life; and because that Nero inclined vnto those which held him vp in his wickednesse, against the which seneca opposed himselfe as time and occasion would suffer him. But his enemies having the Prin- senera acces earc, they failed not to fet vpon this honourable person, because of his age and the services exset by he had done to Nero. They did falfly accuse him, faith Tacitus, for that he having great riches, and more then was fit for a private man, he did still increase them, and grew greater: and besides did gaine and draw the good will of the people too much vnto him. That he had goodlier gardens and morefumptuous houses of pleasure, then the Emperor himselfe. Furthermore, that he imputed all thehonour to himselfe for knowing how to speake excellently well; and that he made verses oftener then he was wont, after that he perceived Nerotooke pleasure to make them himselfe. That flatly condemning Nero his exercises, he mocked him, seeing him ride and manage horses, and laughed at him hearing him sing. And all this was but to make men beleeue that nothing was well done in the affaires of the effate, that proceeded not from his invention. Now that Nero was come out of his infancie, and in the flower of his youth, that he should leave his maister, confidering that his ancestours should serue him well inough for great and good tutors: Seneca vnderstanding by the report of those that yet somewhat regarded vertue and honour, how these lewed incensers did accuse him, perceiuing also that Nero withdrew himselse more and more from his familiaritie, which he had shewed in times past, he befought him to heare him, the which having obtained, he faid thus vnto him: My Lord, it is now fourteene senecates yeares fince I was first called to accompany y great hope that was had of your infancy, & eight oration yeares fince you have bene Emperor: during which time you have heaped fo much goods and vnto N. 100 honor vpon me, that nothing wanteth to my felicity, but to know how to vse them well. To this purpose I wil lay before you notable exaples practised by men of your quality, not of mine. Angustus great father of your grandfathers father, licensed M. Agrippa to withdraw himselfe vnto MYTTLENE, to leade a prinate life: and to C. Mecanis to line at his ease within Rome it selfe, as in some pleasant remote place farther off. The one of them had accompanied him in his warres, and the other having bene beaten and tormented with great tempests in Rome, had bene both, to speake the truth, amply recompenced, as also the great service they had done well deserued it. As for my selfe, Ibrought nothing that deserued you should be so noble and liberall vnto me, but onely my studies nourished (if I may be so bold to speake it) in the shadow, and couertly, from whence notwithstanding all my reputation is proceeded. for as much as it feemeth I have bene in your apprentiships: which truly is to me a great reward and rich recompence. But besides all this, you have infinitely favoured me, and presented me with innumerable goods. In so much that I often reason thus with my selfe: Is it possible, that I that am but of a simple house of Knights (also dwelling without Roms) should hold the place of one of the chiefest Lords of Rome and amongst the most noble, and those that are noted to be of fo great antiquitie, that a new come man as my felfe, hath dared to shew himselfe in place. Where is that spirit that contented it selfe with mediocritie: what meaneth he to have so fine and goodly gardens? What? he walkerh by fuch and fuch houses of pleasures, neareynto the citie. His lands and possessions are of so great an extent, and his mony bringeth him in such a commoditie many wayes, that he is full to the throate. For the which there is nothing to be offered, but a defence for my selse: That I could not refuse your presents. Now we have, both the one and the other, performed our dutie you, in giving so much as a Prince could give to him that he loueth, and I, in receiving that which a man in great favour might have and take of his prince. As for my honours and effates, enuie looketh awry vpon me: howbeit (as all other things of the world) she is under the feete of your greatnesse. Yet in the meane time she lighteth vpon me, and therefore I have neede of helpe. And as in war, or otherwife in travelling abroad, if I were wearie I would require rest: so finding my selfe in the trauell of this life now old & very vamcet for the leaft office, fince I can no longer support the burthen of my riches. I do defire to be discharged. Command therefore that your receivers henceforth do take them and put them into your treasure. I shall not therefore become poore, but when I shall be rid of those things which blindfold me with their brightnesse, I shall bestow my time in studie, which I was wont to imploy in my gardens and possessions. You are young and lustic, and time hatli established you in the greatnesse of your estate: but we that are your ancient servants have leave as it were to repose our selues. It shall be also a great honour for you to have raised those to great office, to whom meane things had fufficed. Vnto this Were made answer, in manner as followerh: Forthat on the fudden I do answer your premeditate Oration, it is because I haue learned it of you, that haue taught me how I stould deale, not onely in things feene farre off, but also in those which are presented upon the sudden unto me. Augustus my grandsather suffered Agrippa and Mecanas to repose themselves after their travels: but it was in such an age, that his authoritie might maintaine that, and any thing else by him granted: and yet he did not take from the one nor the other any goods that he had given vnto them. They got it in the warres, and with danger of their lives: For Augustus spent his youth in warres. I do affure my felfe that your armes nor hands would have failed me, if I had gone to the warres: but as the chate of my affaires did beare, you have by reason, by counsell, and by instructions raifed up my infancie and youth. So will I remember all the dayes of my life the good seruice I have received at your hands. That which you hold of me, your gardens, money in banke, houses in the countrey abroad, all that is subject vnto diverse accidents. And though all together feeme much, yet is it fo, that many farre short of your deferts have possessed more. I am ashamed to name bondmen made free, whom men see richer then you: and the cause that maketh measshamed is, that you whom I should cherishaboue all others, do not passe them in riches and humane greatnesse. Furthermore, you are yet in good age, to gouerne your lands and reuenewes, and we do but now enter into managing the affaires of the Empire: but it may be that you esteeme your selfe lesse then Vitellius, three times Consult: and commend Claudius aboue me, as if I could not by my liberalitie give you as much goods as Volufius by long sparing hath gotten. Moreouer, if our slippery and vnconstant youth sway on one side more then it ought, you reforme it, guiding by your aide and vigilancie that finall direction we haue. If you bring your money into my coffers, if you forfake the Prince, they will not fay it is because you are content with litle, and seeke your ease: but their talke shall be none other, but of my couctousnesse, and my cruestie. And although they should much praise your moderation in this action, yet it becommeth not an old man to feeke honor by doing any thing that should dishonor his friend. Nero added to this fine speech, many embracements and kisses, being made by nature, and brought by custome to cour his malice with false and counterfeit kind-nesse. Seneca (as it is the conclusion of a speech holden with him that commandeth) thanked him: yet he immediatly changed his accustomed manner he was wont to vse during his former greatnesse: gaue them leave to depart that came every morning in troupes to salute him: Seneca that turned away from others that offered to follow and accompany him: very feldome times he went into the citie, and stirred not out of his house, as if he had bene sicke, or troubled after his custome. studie of Philosophie. This was the talke betwixt Nero and Seneca, who having leisurcto bethinke himselse better of the answer of Nero, knew very well that his fortune was changed, and that the disciple was become the master: yea and that so much more dangerous, for that his cruell courage was wrapped vp in fo gracious words and countenances, the which a man was constrained to trust, or at the least to make shew of it.

Were being as it were ouercome by Seneca, was as cruell and more then before, counselled by Tigellinus and Popea. First of all then he began to cut off the heads of Plantus and Sylla, honou- Nevertrurable men, banissed before into Asia & to Marseilles. He refused, confined, and finally put to death his wife, the Princesse Octavia, vsing an infamous and strange manner in his proceedings against her. He maried the adulteresse Popea, who brought him a daughter that died soone after, He counterfeited the player, alwayes intermixing fome new cruelty with his pastimes. Afterwards he being present at a banket made by Tigellinus, in the which were committed all forts of villanies, and he himfelfe being defiled with naturall and vnnaturall whoredomes and abhominations, within few dayes after (a matter incredible, if so many graue historians, amongst others Tacitus did not affure vs of it) he maried one Pythagoras, as his husband, which was of the company of these villans, & was solemnly maried according to the custome of other mariages, The yellow veile of the maried couple couered Neroes head. Soothfayers were fent for the joynter was affigned, the bed of the spouse prepared, the wedding torches were lighted; and to be short, they saw that openly which the night hideth, when the question of mariage is in hand with a woman. Thirdly he set fire on a great number of houses in Rome, so as the most part were burnt. And to cleare himselfe of this wickednesse, he falsly layd it upon the Christians, (being a great number at that time in Rome) that they were the authors of this disorder inasmuch that they were set vpon with a strange crueltie. And yet as they put them to death, they seemed. did a thousand mockeries vnto them, putting beasts skins vpon them to be torne in pecces with dogges, or else they were hanged vpon the crosse, or burnt with a litle fire : their wood houses, or stacks of wood serued to give light in the night. Now though the people of Rome were Obloudily bent against these innocents, yet there were many that had pity of them, seeing honest mentormented, to fatisfie the cruell infolencie of Nero: who apparrelled like a coach-man, and drining the horsehimselse in the middest of these confusions, made the people passime. Besides all this he forraged and ranfaked all ITALIE with impositions and excessive lones, ruining the townes, and not sparing also the temples of Rome, of Asia, nor of Greece. It was ginen out abroad, faith Tacinus, that Seneca (whom Nero went oftentimes to visite, to keepe him in breath, and gently to lull him afleepe) to avoide the suspition that he had bene of counsell in this sacriledge, had asked leaue to go to some house of his farre into the countrey. Which being de-make as good. From that time forth they could see nothing in Rome but imprisoning of men of qualitie, and preparation for execution which followed. Sence , that firred not out of the countrey, was not forgotten of Popea, nor of Tigellinus, falle to hich were the ferret coun fellors of Nero in his cruelties. And Nero also failed not rotate had bested which were the fecret counsellors of Nero in his cruelties. And Nero also failed not to take hold dogge.

nied him, he kept his chamber faining to be ficke of the goute. Some have written that a bond-man of his enfranchised, called Cleonicus, did prepare to poyson him by the commandement of

Were: the which he auoided vpon warning ginen him by him, or for that he feared fuch a thing, living meanely, eating such fruits as were brought him out of the country, and being contented to drinke cleare running water if he were athirst. Such detestable wickednesse of Nero having of long time offended many honourable persons, which could no longer endure such a maister, they resolued to set themselues at liberty, and cospired to kil him one day when they saw opor-tunitie. The day being come, one called Millions, an infranchifed bondman of one of the principall conspirators, went to discouer to Nevo what they had complotted against him. This gaue a strange alarme vnto the Emperour, who caused them to lay hands of one and other, amongst which number there was Lucan the nephew of Seneca, that was a party in this conspi-racie, for anger against Nero: who was the cause that his verses were not had in that estimation

of this occasion to make away his schoole-master, whose shadow did torment him. It was not for that Seneca was partaker of the counsell with the conspirators, but Nero was glad to find the meane to dispatch him with a sword, since he could not do it by poyson. For one of the conspirators called Natalis (whom N ero had pardoned) faid nothing else of him, but that he was fent to visite Seneca being sicke, and to complaine because he thought not good that Fife (being the head of this enterprise, and should be created Emperour after the murther of Were) should come to fee him, and that he would confirme their friendfhip, frequenting familiarly together. but that Seneca had answered, that their talke and meeting would neither be profitable for the one, nor for the other; and moreouer, that his life depended upon that of Pifo. Granius Silvanius. Captaine of a band of guards, was commanded to go to Seneca, to know if he would take any knowledge to have fooken the words confessed by Natalia, and the answer that he made at that time. By chance, or wittingly, Seneca was come home that very day, and remained in a house of his two small miles from Rom E. The Captaine came thither about night, and placed his souldiers round about the house and afterwards came in, and found Sencea at supper with his wife Pompeia Paulina, and two of his friends. So having delivered his message vnto him, Senera answered straight being nothing moued; that Natalis was indeed fent vnto him to complaine in the name of Pilo, for that Seneca would not fuffer him to come and fee him and that for him. felfe, he did excuse himselfe as well by reason of his sicknesse, as for the defire he had to take his case. And for those words: that his life depended vpon that of Pifo, he said he had no occasion to preferre the preferuation of another private mans life before his owne. And that furthermore, he gaue not his mind to flatteries, whereof he would have no better testimony then Nera himselfe, who had oftener known that Seneca was a free man, then a slaue or a bondman. Siluanus returned vnto Nero, and made report in the presence of Fopea and Tigellinus, who were very defirous to heare his answer: which being heard, Nero asked him, if Seneca made any shew to be willing to die. The Captaine affured him that he perceived no figne of feare nor of forow, in the words, nor countenance of Senera. Thereupon Nerro commanded this Captaine to returne to Seneca againe, and to command him to die. Some thinke that this executioner returned not againe that way he was come, but went another way, to find out Fenius Captaine of the guards, whom after he had acquainted with Neroes commandement, he asked him if he would execute this commission. Fenius that was of the number of the conspirators, neuerthe lefte adulted him to obey the Emperours commandement, by a fatal coward line if of as ma-0 ny as were of them. For Silvanus that had this commission to go to Seneca, was also one of the conspiracie, and yet his hand was ready to increase the wickednesse of Nero, of the which before he was defirous and procured to fee the punishment. To hide his offence in some fort, he would not, or durst not returned into the presence of Seneca, nor speake to him: but made one of his Centeners go into the house to declare the Emperours commandement, which was, that Seneca must dye. At that time it was halfe a fauour vnto those that were condemned to lose their lives, to fuffer them to be put to death, either by themselves, or by any of their acquaintance; which was done in diverse forts. Some pricked their veines, and let themselves bloud, and then went into a hot-house where they ended. Others swallowed downe poyson: Others stabbed themselues in with their daggers, or their fwords. It is judged this was done; that they should not fall into the hands of the hangman: for when it happened fo, the bodies of the condemned were not buried, and their goods were for feited: whereas if they put themselves to death (of the which the most part following the doctrine of the Stoick Bs were nothing afraid) their bodies should be buried, and their wils and testaments good. Sometimes this choise did cut off the griefes of a more ignominious and cruell punishment.

Now to returne to Seneca. Having heard the message of the Centener, without changing countenance, and wholly refolued, he called for his booke of tables, in the which was written his will: which being denied him by the Centener, turning to his friends, he protested, that fince he was let to acknowledge their merites, that he would leave one onely thing (and notwithstanding the bestyyethis, to wit, the image of the example of his life, the which if they remembred, they would cary a commendable reputation of honest & vertuous men, for a worthy reward of so constant a friendship. And seeing the weepe, he sought to appeale them, or to stay their teares, now with sweete words, by and by with vehemency, as if he would have reproued them. To conclude he did encourage them to remaine firme and constant, asking them where was the resolution they had learned so many yeares in the schooles and studies of Philosophie, against all the chances of the world. He added further, that every one knew wel what Nero was, what cruelties hehad committed; and after that he had fo wickedly behaued himfelfe to his father in law, to his mother, to his brother and to his wife, there was nothing left behind for the accomplishment of his cruelties, but to adde too the murther of his schoolemaster. After he had discoursed such or the like words before them all, and as in generall, he embraced his wife, and hauing a litle emboldened her against this blow, he instantly prayed her to moderate her griefe, firsthis and exhorted her also to remember how vertuously he had passed his life, and gently to beare wife, a (and with a heart worthy her felfe) the forow of the death of her husband. She for her part affured him that she was resolved to die, and bad one of them give her the blow. Then seneca; not to death. deprine himselfe of that honour, & being touched with the loue he did beare her, was contented not to leaue to the mercie of the diffolution that then reigned, her whom he had most dearely loued. I did fet before you (faid he) the fweetnesse of life; but since your selfe haue chosen rather an honourable death for my part. I shall not be fory if you shew me y way. Let the constancy therfore of fo couragious a death as ours, be alike to vs both although y end of your life shal be more famous. Immediatly thereupon, they caused the veines of their armes to be opened; but because sine and that Seneca had anold bodic, and thin by eating little, there would no bloud come out but drop would have by drop, he made the veines of his legs and hams to be cut. Then wearie of fuch a cruell butche- dyed by rie, being affraid that his paines would make his wives heart faile her, or that he himselfe should bieding. grow impatient for fo many torments as he endured, he perfwaded her to withdraw herfelfe into another chamber: and for himselfe, having to his last gaspe his words at commandement, he caused his Secretaries that were wont to write vnder him, to come vnto him, & told them there many notable things in fine termes, the which were published after his death: but time hath taken them from vs for want of storie-writers: although some thinke that that might be kept as well as other writings of Seneca. Others carying fome enuy to the vertue of this man, haue kept irbacke, being loth that the posteritie should enjoy a table, where the visage of Seneca might be better knowne, then in other places of his workes, Nero that had men coming and going enery minute of an houre from Senecaes house to Rome, understanding how every thing passed, and bearing no particular hatred to Paulina, fearing also he should increase the blame of his crueltic: he commanded they should keepe Paulina from dying. Wherefore his slaues and freedbond. men, warned by the fouldiers themselues, bound vp her armes, and staunched the bloud, not that seneknowing whether she felt any thing or not. For as there are alwayes among the people that take should be things at the worst, there wanted not men which thought that so long as Paulina stood in search hope from of Neroes anger, the defired to have the report that the was a companion of the death of her huf- death. band. But afterwards whe there was a better hope offered her, the was contented to be won with the flatteries of life, vnto the which she added some few yeares with comendable memory and forow for her husbad: being otherwise so pale of coutenance, that she shewed to have lost a great deale of bloud and her strength. On the other side Seneca seeing his death prolonged, he prayed Statius Annaus (whom he efteemed much for his faithfull friendship he had borne him a long time, and for his skil in Phisicke) to bring him of the like poison to that which they keep by publike ordinance in ATHENS to put offenders to death, whereof he had of long time made prouision. So when it was brought him, he swallowed it downe without regard, his members being cold, and his body constant against the force of the poyson. In the end, he entred into a bathing The manner tub of hor water, with the which sprinckling his slaues that were about him, he added to it, that death. he offered this liquour vnto Iupiter the deliuerer. After that being caried into a stone, and having through the hearthereof yeelded vp the ghost, his bodie was burned without any solemnitie of obsequies. He had so appointed by his will made at that time when he was very rich, and of great credit. It was reported that Subrius Flauius, one of the chiefest conspirators, had secretly determined with the Centeners (yet not without the privity of Seneca) that after they had killed Nero by the meanes of Pifo, they should also dispatch Pifo himselfe, to the end to make Seneca Emperour, as an honest man, onely elect and chosen to that greatnesse for the same of his vertues. Such was the end of Seneca, that had lived in honourable and publike charges, of Prætor, Quartor and Conful vndertwo Emperours, and was long in credit with the last: who seeing himselfe couertly despised of his master, that could no longer endure such wickednesse, sought the occasion before mentioned, but with extreme iniustice, to rid him out of the way. Furthermore, Dion thinketh that Senecaes two brethen were likewife put to death. But because he is contented to touch it but in a line, and that which Tacitus faith is to be marked, fet downe in particular, and with most likely circumstances; we will speake one word more. Shortly after the death of Seneca, he commanded they should put Anneus Lucanus to death, the sonne of Mela who feeling his feet and his hands cold whilest the bloud randowne, and that by little and little his spirit parted from the extremities of his body, his heart being yet lively, & his vnderstanding good, calling certain verses of Poetry to mind, in the which was presented a souldier hurt, dying of the same death, he recited the same verses, which were the last words he spake. Altitia Lucans mother was left aliue, neither being pardoned nor punished. For Iunius Gallio, who was a Senator, was so astonied at the death of his brother, that before all the Senate he fell downe at Neroes feet, beseeching him to give him his life. Whereupon another Senator called Alienus Clemens, ser vpon him with iniurious words, calling him traitor and parricide. But the other Senatours with one consent made Clement hold his peace, telling him that he should not seeke common aduerfities for to reuenge his private quarrel, or to draw on the Prince to a new cruelty, who had now by his clemencie quietted and forgotten all. Within a few moneths after Anneus Melawas dispatched: he was a knight of Rome, but of the dignitie of a Senatour. And although Seneca and Gallio his brethren were aduanced to greater honor, yet he would never purchase it by extremitie of ambition but being come out of Spaine to Rome, more for the love of his brethren and of his fonne then for himselfe, he was contented to have this honour, that a knight was cuere. qual in power & credite with a Conful. The name of his fon Lucanus greatly effected of eurry bodie, and specially of learned men, had gotten him great reputation. Immediatly after his sons death, he feeking fornewhat too cagerly after his fons goods, raifed against him an accuser called Fabius Romanus, one of Lucanus chiefest friends. This man showed counterfeit letters as done by Lucanus, which charged Mela that he was partaker with his fon of the complor against Nero. Though this accufation was vtterly false and fained, yet Nero that thirsted after the riches of Mela, commanded those letters should be caried to Mela: that was as much to say, he must die. The which Melaknowing well enough, made his veines to be opened, and followed the way of others. Seneca in his writings yeeldeth great testimonie of the constancie and vertue of his brethremand I thinke he was a man that was not given to speake lightly. Notwithstanding, I have simply recited that which Tacitus faith, who sufficiently sheweth in the example of divers others that it is not to be maruelled at if the cruelties of Nero, who lesse spared the great then the small, made the boldest hearts of them all quake sometimes.

Sophy and

of Annana

Now there remaineth to tell you fomething of the Philosophie and writings of seneca; for it is in those tables that we must looke to see him lively, and speaking with that selfe vehemencie of spirit that followed him even to the last gaspe of his life. It is true that the insolencies of Nero had oftentimes as it were stopped his mouth, and hindered that good soule to give free passage to his discourses, yea and in some places they made him stumble. Yet he called himselfe backe againe to his first thoughts, and remained constant in the midst of the cruell raging stormes of his time. Now as it is easie for menthat be on the land, where they do idly behold some master Pilot ftriuing with the force and furie of the wind and billowes, to fay: That man there should guide his ship after another fastion: who if they were in his place, should without all comparifon find themselues more troubled, or at the least would make a forrowfull wracke. Euensoit happeneth, that Senecaes Philosophie is dispised of many, that think he could speake Philosophy but by his booke, and that when he should come to shew it in deed, men wold say he doth like the masters of fence, who being in a schoole of fence with yong youths, they do wonders, and giue mortal vennies at pleasure: but if they come to any private fight at the sharpe, where it standeththem vpon for their liues, assoone as they see the glistering of the naked sword, you may perceiue all their flourishes and trickes are gone, or changed into flat running away. I will fay at one word, that I thinke Seneca as much and more a Philosopher in deed then in name. His life and his death can fay it, and in the last Chapter hereafter we must speake more at large. For this present let vs a little consider his tongue. Life is a sweet thing, and all defire to live, yea the beasts clarehim to themselues seeme to haue a singular contentment, for that they have a being and life. If life bea pleasant thing, yet it is much more pleasing and acceptable when it is well gouerned, and tendeth to a good end. So then a quiet and contented life is much better, fweeter, and more excellent, then a life full of troubles and passions. This quietnesse is none other but felicitie and good fortune, Furthermore, all men do not aspire to this end, but onely wise men, and the true friends of wildome. For the most part of men whom the earth sustaineth, do runne a strange course when they should set a foote forward to betake them to some course of life; and all in ma- Most men ner erre, when they should Judge what happie life is. Those that delight in money and to gaine, erre in such as felicitie in riches. The idle and flow bill thinks that to make great cheere to live (as they feeke felicitie in riches. The idle and flouthfull thinke, that to make great cheere, to live (as they happy life. fay) in the shadow of tables, of pots, of curtaines, and at the ease of their bodies, is the onely soueraigne good. There are another fort of men greedy of worldly honour, which establish an vnspeakeable happinesse to command many, (in what maner, or how deare soeuer it be) taking themsclues to be halfe gods, if they may see many men, or two or three go under their feet. But wise men establish soueraigne good in vertue. And if they be asked, what is a happy life : they Happy life answer, That it consistest in living vertuously and serving God. This was the Philosophie of seneca in generall. But because there are certain clouds of opinions which darken humane felicitie, itisgood we looke to examine them briefly. Nature hath dispersed in vs some seeds of vertue, and hath giuen vs some graines of knowledge and wisedome, which are borne with vs and take roote (if we may fay fo) in our hearts. This notwithstanding, we must manure it, and vertue hath her precepts which openeth the way to attaine the fourraigne good, whereunto the Philosophie of the stoickes doth summon vs. Fourethings are enemies to that good, yeathey ob- Foure scure it, they corrupt and abolish it in an euill disposed heart. The first cause is death, that is to fay, the feare and imagination to lose this earthly & corruptible life. For where there is feare, it many cood, cannot be faid there is contentment and felicitie, but miferie: it is not a pleafant life, but a forrowfull life, and a torment of the mind. The fecond is the bodily griefes, lingering difeafes, the torments and tortures cruell and sharpe in a thousand kinds; and briefly a thousand enils which hurt the contentment of the foule. For no man will fay, that to be troubled in his mind with a burning feauer, to crie out night and day because of the gowte, or for paine of his teeth and the reins, or to be brought to any extraordinarie torment, & to be difmembred by the hangman, is a thing where there is no apprehension that moueth the spirit. Besides all this, there are the griefes of the foule: mourning, loffe of children, of kinsfolks and deare friends: for that afflicteth and eateth our thoughts without ceasing, and giueth tragicall Poets ample arguments to write vpon. If the griefe of the body affecteth the relt and contentment of the mind; much more doth the inward griefe and anguish. And finally there are passions, as ioy and pleasure, which hinder and abolish the feeling of a happie life. Those that are possessed with an extraordinarie ioy, oftentimes both do and lay many fond things and iestures, in words and workes. As if a man be told that land is fallen to him, or that he is raised to wished dignitie not looked for ye shall see him play the foole and wanton like a child. There are some whose maners honor changeth in such fort, that from the day till the next morning you shall not know them by their face, by the countenances, by their words, nor by their apparell: they will straight difdaine them that they called before servants or louing friends. Now this vaine pride and foolish. nessearch maner one selfe thing: and it may be said, that all ambitious men are altogether beforted, or doubtlesse they will be so. If thou wilt make me see a proud man, one that presumeth to know much, and that looketh vpon his feathers, as they fay, I will prefently flrew thee a foole furnished at all peeces. There is no surer signe of foolishnesse then pride and who will say then Pride Been. that the life of fuch a one is happier. And as for pleasures, we see how a man is caried away, who then is no more himselfe: but to the contrary, thinketh that the destruction of body and soule "". is his foueraigne good. Now amongft all the Philosophers which have tried to remedic these troubles of the mind, and to maintaine a man in this contentment which they call fourraigne, it may be faid the Stoickes were the chiefe, and among the Stoickes Senera. I wil not here enter into examination of the doctrine of this fect, nor declare that which Zeno and Chrysippus haue written, as may be gathered of Laertius and of Plutarch, but fimply to stay my selfeypon my principall purpose, which is of Seneca; and in this place to follow that which many learned men have gathered of his workes, to shew what was his Philosophie: vnto the which we will adde fome Summarie of reasons with the which he helpeth himself, to fight with those pasfions, and to make the foule at peace, a fmuch as he himselfe could apprehend it. This is out seneed preof all question, that Seneca was one of the first and principall Philosophers of the Stoickes a- Stoickes to. mong the Latines, as he himselfe doth boast in his owne writings. Furthermore, he exalteth fortall a this feet aboue allothers, and faith, that the Stoickes do make profession of a Philosophy wor-

in the world but ferueth his turne, and whereof he is not mafter with a fingular contentment. Of

thie of men: for a fmuch as there is difference betwirt them and others, as betwirt males and females. That the other kinds of Philosophie are made, to heare and to obey:but that the Stoicke is borneto teach, and command. He being defirous to present some perfect Idea of a wise man. bringeth foorth Cato: and in the Treatie where he will shew that the wife man cannot be offended nor outraged, he lifteth vp this man out of the rancke of al other men, & specially commendeth him in his death. If he speake of the Stoickes, he calleth them his, and doth make open profession of their instructions. Now in many places he distinguisheth Philosophie into three parts which he calleth Rationall, Morall, and Naturall. But after the fashion of the Stoickes, he rested more vpon the moral, albeit that all his discourses shew that he had a maruellous veine in the rationall. And the bookes of natural questions shew that he had a deepe in fight in the secrets of nature. So then his principal end was to frame good maners, and to bring mento the knowledge of the contentment of the mind, to defire and apprehend it. They faw him oftentimes exhort Lucilius to the studie of morall Philosophie, as in the end of his 89. Epistle: So set downe these things, faith he to others, that thou thy felfe maift take pleafure to comprehend them. Write to reade afterwards thy writing, referring all things to the reformation of life, and to the meanes of appealing the furie of passions. Study not to be wifer then others, but to be better. On the other fide, he turned the same Lucilius from the study of Logicke, and from the subtile disputations, in the which they please themselves that do but linger after syllables and words. Leave (said he to him in the 71. Epiftle) this occupation and fifting of letters, to those maisters that shut vp athing fo magnificent as Philosophy is in fyllables; and do imbrace, yea bring to nothing, & vtterly destroy the mind, in teaching things that are not worth the labour and study. I am content that thou refemble wife men that have invented letters, but not those that teach them. In some other places he laugheth at y fubtleties of these schoole disputers, namely, where he setteth down one of their fashions of speech, to wit, in the 48. which is the 49 in the editions not well corrected, you these words: Mus(that is to fay, a mouse) is a syllable a mouse eateth cheese, therefore it followeth that a fyllable eateth cheese. But it is not only that he setteth vpon Logicke, or rationall Philosophie, but also on the sciences commonly called the liberall sciences, & especially when there is question of the Philosophie of manners. Witnessethat which he writethin the fourescore and eight Epistle worthy to be diligently read of all, but specially of them whom fuch sciences do puffevo, & who for the rest do litle care to rule their life within the compasse of vertue. In fum, he declareth in a great number of places, that Philosophie confisteth not in the knowledge of those things but that the end thereof is to give counsell against all the accidents of this life; and that men were wont to repaire vnto Philosophers, who do show them in the midst of darkneffe (wherwith humane fociety is fnared) the way they must follow not to erre, shewing what things are necessary and profitable: how easie the lawes of nature are: how joy full i we liue, & at our ease, following of the same. And to the contrary, that there can be nothing but mifery in the condition of those, which suffer themselves to wander rather by opinion, then by nature and reason. I think therefore that all the Philosophie of Seneca looketh vnto that to establish the mindall that may be to attain to the which, it speaketh of the soueraigne good, to the end to draw vs to aspire vnto it. And because the accidents of this life, namely the causes before mentioned, do observe this happines, he striugth with infinit discourses and reasons against the. Now it were to make a great volume, if all were put together that he speaketh, & it were better to leave it to their liberty that shall reade y works of this Philosopher, of the which I wil note here some heads or rules, on the which he reasoneth very amply to remedy the griefes before named. The intention therfore of Seneca aboue all in matters most important, is to beat down first, all corporall and spiritual passions to wit opinion and apprehension. He discouereth the vanity, sheweth the wrong whichmen of understanding do, and the errour of their judgement, who see things as in the water, and with a corrupt eye. Which done, he goeth further, and feeketh to fhew, that when that which is called euil is arrived the wifeman feeleth it not as also it is as litle trouble to him when one thinketh to touch him, as it is then when one threatned him a far off. For proofe of this, he sheweth that they cannot hurt a wife man any maner of way: and that no man is iniuried or hurt but by himself. That the wife man bending all his thoughts vnto vertue, canot be offended, but rather ouercomethall humane accidents, as well for respect of himselfe, as for all others. Hereupon he cometh to this point, to maintaine, that that which they call euill, is good to the wiseman, who like a good husband maketh his profit of all in such fort, that there is nothing these rules and maximes, there rife many Paradoxes, dispersed in his bookes, the which if a man confider apart, are very strange and ridiculous withall but being brought to their originals, they may receive some exposition. Furthermore, to frame a perfect wise man, he will have nothing nleafant vnto him but vertue, which confisteth in contemning all that the world admireth; and a loue of beautifull things which give contentment to the foule. That all that which is earthly and corruptible, should be esteemed as much as nothing: that the wife man infolding himselfe in his vertue, feethall the greatnesse of this world very low under him, and as it were troden under the feet of his heart. And that in the midst of all dangers, yea even in the most fiercest death of all and when heaven should fall upon him, he remaineth merie and pleased with the felicitie which his vertue bringeth vnto him. Afterwards he reasoneth particularly against the apprehension of death: and sheweth that it is as incuitable, as it is also good and necessarie. That the greatest contentment of a wife man is, that he can breake in funder the iron chaine that holdeth him, as often and when he thinketh good: and vpon this occasion treateth in some places of the immortality of the foule, as in the end of the feuen & fiftieth Epiffle, in the threefcore and fifth, threefcore and fixecenth, and the hundred and seucnteenth, in his comfortable discourse vnto Martia, and elle- senters where. Touching these corporall paines, he sheweth that they cannot turn a man out of the pathway of vertue, nor from the profession of constancie and truth, nor from the resolution to maintaine a iust cause. That there is no paine or griefe so sharpe, that can let a wise man to thinke of his duty, and to acquaint himselfe so far as his hands may reach. That these corporal griefes cannoteclipse the least of the beames of vertue, & the hope of the immortality of our soules, for the which we exchange in the day that our paines come, as it were to have greatest strength, all the discommodities we apprehend in this transitory life. Furthermore, that the troubles which the eflate of this world doth foread as a veile before our minds, cannot blindfold the to see the perfed beautie of vertue, and to hearethe excellent comforts which she proposeth. Also that the wise man is sufficiently defended not to be ouercome by passions, which have no power on him that is in the ordinarie safegard and protection of vertue, in possession wheroshe is already so enwed, that he stil goeth forward every day more then other, shortly to enjoy her with perfection. To conclude, that there is no hinderance at all for him whom vertue pleafeth, and whom fire bringeth to immortalitie. And this is a little touch (me thinketh) which may be particularly noted in Seneca: in the beautie whereof, as in faces better formed, there are some spots discovered asin other Philosophers, namely the Stoicks. About all, in his portraiture of this wife man, he imagineth in this life a thing that is not to be found in a corrupt man given over to fenfualitie: which is, vertue and perfection. But let vs refer that to the ignorance of true religion, and confider this Philosopher in the limits of his sect. For other Paradoxes, as of the world, of the spirit, of passions and affections of vertue, & some others borrowed of the schoole of his masters, that Plutarch hath examined in his booke Of common conceptions, and in that which he entituleth, The contradiction of the Stoicks: that which is euill doth condemne it felfe, or excuseth it felfe under the questions and disputations; which permit a man to say somewhat. And for the other, for a smuch as Senece made profession to forme maners, he seemeth therin to have given way and free paffage to some of his conceptions, and after the example of Painters, to give some shadowes vnto his tables, the better to retaine the judgement of the reader. That which I least allow whatinmisin him, or rather which I cannot approue, is the excessive praise he giveth to his wife man, lifting liked in him vp, yea aboue the gods. And afterwards in diverse places he would have this wife man put himselfe to death, and of his authoritie and power dissolue the bands of this life, without leave of the soueraigne Captaine, and with a testimonic of a strange cowardlinesse and distrust of the doctrine of the eternall Prouidence: the which would have vs keepe a stedfast hope and confidence, yearenen when things feeme to be most desperate. And that which he often applyeth vito the death of Caso, whom he infinitly commendeth, hath bene by vs examined in the comparison of Cato and Phosion. Furthermore, Seneca stayed not vpon one or two in his discourses he hath left vnto vs. but hath culled out all the Philosophers Greekes and Latines which were before him, alkthat he thought good to fet downe for the rule and gouernment of our life, according to the end he looked vnto. And as for his writings, all that we have left concerning morall and naturall Philosophie, with the pleasant discourse vpon the death of Claudius, is

tearmes for that time, and after the manner of teaching of the Stoicks, doth shew it. But for the bookes entituled, Controversia es Suasoria, that is to say, pleadings and orations, or declamations. I am of the same opinion that diverse learned men of our time are to wit, that these bookes are not of Seneca, but of the father of Seneca. And because many other learned men ancient and mo. derne haue thought the contrarie, we must needs fay somewhat for proofe of the opinion which wefollow. The authour of these collections saith, that he heard ouid & Cicero declaime, andthat he was familiar with Portius Latro, Valerius, Messala, and with others that were in the time of Augustus. When he heard Cicero, he could be no lesse then fifteene yeares old: how can that bear. tributed vnto Seneca, dead in the end of the Empire of Nero, wel-neare fixe fcore years after that time ? Now, that which Tacitus speaketh in diverse places of the age of Seneca, teacheth notso farre: and Nero speaking to Scneca a little before his death, said, that he had yet strength enough to vse his goods, and gouerne his possessions: that could not be spoken of an old man of ahundred and twelue yeares old. Also Seneca speaketh otherwise of his age in one of his Epistlesno. ted here before, where he telleth that about the fifth yeare of the Empire of Tiberius, he came out of his infancy, of the age of eightcene yeares. Furthermore, Seneca was Prætor, Qualtor. and Consul, as in his discourse to his mother Elbia, the Chronicles, and the Lawyers bookes do make mention. And to the contrary, his father dedicating his bookes about named vnto seneca, Iunius, and Mela, his three sons: and speaking to Mela in the Preface of his second booke of pleadings, he exhorteth him to follow the inclination of his mind, and contenting himselfe with the state of a private gentleman, and a Romaine knight as his father, the better to warrant his life in the hazards and accidents of this world. That which made Seneca to be effected the author of those bookes there, is, for that his father did beare that name: and that these three, Seneca; Nouatus, (furnamed Iunius Gallo) and Mela be brethren, and the fonnes of one selfe father and mother, it appeareth by the historic of Tacitus, in the fifteenth booke of his Annales, and by the writings of Seneca himselfe, specially by the discourse to Elbia, where he saith amongst other things: Confider my brethren, that being safe, you have no cause to accuse Fortune . you have in them cause to reioyce in a diverse kind. For the one, through his good wit hath attained to honour. and the other hath wifely despised it. Tacitus plainly shewed that, as we have seene herebefore. And whereas commonly they alledge the age of Seneca to be fixe fcore yeares & aboue, to give the more authority to the pleadings and Orations of his father, that is to fay, to the fragments which he seemeth to have set forth in the favour of his children, to frame them betimes one day to practife that whereof he made profession, to wit, eloquence there cannot be shewed any furficient or authenticke testimonie of that which is alledged, that Seneca had three sonnes calbegainered Icd, Nouatus, Seneca, and Mela. Touching the true bookes of Seneca, the diligent reading and confideration of them will continently flew the profit that may be gathered by them. For a man to fland resolucd against the diverse and troublesome events of this life, to repose himselfe fweetly vpon the divine providence, to contemne death, and to defire the bleffed immortality, for to represse the insolencie of strange passions which do often carievs too high and too farre, and for to enjoy a great rest amongst so many tempests and wrackes as happen daily. I know not an Historian among the Painims, Philosopher, Oragor, or author what soeuer, that I would preferre before Seneca: yea, there are few to be compared to him, and the most part do follow him farre off.

This bringeth vs to the confideration of some censures made of Seneca by diverse learned men, as well ancient, as those of this latter age, to the end to induce them that behold Seneca, to looke nearly into him: for if there be any thing wherein humane wit doth give scope & licece, let another judge that. But that specially is as an ordinary thing vnto them that make profession fludiously to thrust their noses into bookes to marke presently, and sometime too suddenly that which is before the to beare others in hand afterwards, that things are fuch as they did imagine them to be. And although I do not acknowledge my felfe to be one of the number of them that reade and know passably something; yet for all that ere I beware, I am too often attainted with this disease, which possesset that make many bookes, reprouing and judging others. But as I do not commend them in any wifevnto whom the bookes of found erudition are not pleafing, (like to weake fromacks vnto whom meats cuill dreffed and also hurtfull, seeme to be the most fauorie, but feede themselves with their follies, vaine fancies and abhominations, wherewith this latter age is miserably defiled: so would I wish that the excellent wits which are yet in Evrope sawhere on the one fide better aduited in many respects, and on the other more careful to different that which is commendable and blameable, certaine or vicertaine in good authors: to note them particularly vnto posteritie, with two conditions; the one, that it should be done by the fufficientest men, and as it were of purpose appointed to that end, by consent of same and truth: the other, that all fcoffes, spitefull and finister passions, should be farre from such cenfurers. To come againe to Seneca: I fee that fome have too much exalted him, as I thinke: and others have imbaled him more then needed. Which being particularly confidered, peradnenture it will not missive and if it profite not. I hope it will mouethe Reader to some thought higher then mine, both to fearch matters more exactly, as alfoto fettle his opinion ypon mine with the compasse of truth, of mildnesse, and of vertue. Because Seneca speaketh amply in some places of the providence and maieftic of God, before whom he exhorteth vs to walke, and fomtimes prayeth Lucitius to line with men as if God faw him, and to speake with God, as if men Pagano heard him; also that he died in the end of the Empire of Nero, at which time S. Paul the Apofile was prisoner at Rome is some hauc thought that Seneca of long time had leaned vnto Christian Religion, by reason whereof his writings were read as proceeding from a man advanced in the knowledge of the true God. And otherwise he was contented to speake in general and as yndera veile of the ignorance of his time, and because he would have them no more enuied whom the world did already hate. Briefly, that he was a fecret disciple of Christ, in y schoole of his Apossile. In confirmation whereof, they shew certaine letters of Seneca vnto Paul, with mutuall aniwers and they do adde also the testimonie of a great Christian Doctor, who hath placed seneca in the Catalogue of Saints, whose soules we believe are in glorie with their Saujour. Howbeit certaine learned men of our time have spoken their opinion touching all that, to whom I do agree, to wit: that whether Seneca faw the Apostle and spake with him, whether he disdained to fee him, or that he cared not, nor did inquire after him, as I thinke that he thought then of any thing elfe rather then of the doctrine taught by S. Paul: there is nothing in his life, in his writings nor in his death, that cometh neare to the Christian beleefe and profession. But if we should call all those Christians, in whose writings we do reade goodly and true sentences of wisdome, iuflice, and the providence of God, it would make a strange mingling of Scripture with prophane bookes, and further, they would dispute if the one should be put in the place of the other. As we fee that in the bodies of the bookes which for excellencie we call the Bible, there are two in the which the name of God is neuer expressed which not with standing are holy, and do containe infinit inftructions and fingular confolations. Seneca having written in some place, The Godhead is I know not what great thing, yea so great, that it passeth al mans understanding: Our life is dedicated to his feruice: Let vs take order to be approved of the fame: for a hidden confeience is good for nothing: God feethys: an ancient Doctour faid thereupon; Any man that should know God, could be fet foorth any more certaineveritie, then that which is spoken here by the mouth of aman that knew not what true Religion meant. For herepresenteth the maieflie of God, faying that it is so great, that mans understanding cannot measure it; and plainely, the fountaine of veritie: shewing that the life of men is not unprofitable, (as some Epicurians think) fince it is referred to the glory of the Creator, when they follow inflice and pietie. Other discourses of Seneca might be alledged touching the providence of God, against idolatry, superflition, and impletic; but the confequence is not stable, that he hath therefore knowne any thing of the doctrine of the Gospell; you shall not find one discourse in all his writings, and the doctrine of the Stoickes doth in nothing agree with that, which neither flesh nor bloud can reueale; and wherof it is not our purpose to speake in this place, which requireth not that we shold discouer the holy things, and much lesse that we should mingle them with the prophane. As for the letter published under the name of Seneca and of Paul, both the stile and the matter flow at the first fight, that it is the worke of some idle man that thought himselfe very wise, if he the name of diffembled with those which did not fift it so narrowly. And we shall not need here to make a recapitulation of the iust and learned censures that have bene made; where you shall see the mad. S. Paul; neffe, repugnancies, and falshoods hidden in those letters, if they be conferred with the life and doctrine of them vnto whom they were attributed. We do not meet with any thing so much in the writings of Seneca, as the confrancie and contempt of death: how cometh it then that you shall not find one word that sheweth him to be a Christian e that 20 ero had not discouered or Perceived any thing to charge Seneca with, when he commanded him to die? an ample discharge before the people that extremely hated the Christians. Suetonius and Tacitus, litle fauouring our Religion, would not have forgottenit. But how chanceth it that in his death he remembred lupiter, and not Christ: Now, in regard of the Catalogue which is alledged for a buckler, I desire that learned men do consider, if they have not wronged the person to whom it is attributed, mingling amongst his workes this scoffe, and others which are no better. forged vpon the like anuile and with the selfe same hammer, which the letters were beforemen tioned. Now I thinke, (thefe are the words of a learned manthat had well read Seneca) that it is best for the reader to take senecaes bookes, as proceeding from a man ignorant of true religion. For if you reade them as a Pagan, he hath written like a Christian: but if you take him for a Christian, know that it is a Pagan that speaketh. There are many things that may inflame ve with the lone of vertue: they will pricke vs more nearely, if we remeber from whom they come, It we meet with any sentences that seeme to be drawn out of our fountains, they will be so much the sweeter vnto vs:and as for vncertaine and false opinions, they will offend vs lesse, when we shall say, that it is a Pagan that hath set them out. Let vs come to the other point, and consider those that have too much imbased him, either in respect of his life, or because of his writings. For his life, fome (and Dion amongst others) have accused him of auarice, of ambition, of dissolution on, of adulterie, and of other fuch like vices: vnto the which I wil not vouchfafe to make answer, fince so many learned men ancient, and moderne, and the life and death of Seneca do say the contrary. And it werean easie thing for one that would cut Dion a gowne of his owne cloth, to discouer in him many things impertinent and cuill beseeming the name whereof he maketh profession. But it is better to confute euident slanders by silence, then with long discourse. Some other speake not so plainely, but say that Seneca lived not after his owne precepts. On the contrary, the honour which he maketh often to Epicurus, seemeth to shew that he hath mingled the wickednesse of the Epicurians with the austeritie of the Stoickes. I grant that Seneca hath not in all the parts of his life shewed this constancie which he requireth of a wise man, and I perceiue well that he hath diffembled too many things in the government of Nero: the which the wife Thrasea would never have allowed of the presence, nor of the word, nor of the deed. But mans infirmitie is such, that that which the mind seeth plainely enough, it cannot or dare not effect it, because of the resistance of reason & passions: or if it dare, it is staied with the least object through this naturall faintnesse that keepeth vs backe, when we should resolutely follow vertue. Now of this censure there followeth no more, but that the eternal Wisedoine doth gine vs knowledge of many notable things vetered by the mouth & testimony of this stranger: and in the meanetime doth admonish vs in no wise to stay our selues vpon him that speaketh: which she doth well in her proper house, where she vnderstandeth that we lend our eares vnto those which go withother feet then they should, so that they keepe within the bounds of their commission. And as a Sergeant or Herauld that had but one eye, or were lame, could not with standing deliuer a meffage of importance in the name of the Prince, and must be heard; euen so, what soewer he be that cometh to vs with the notes of chast and faire Veritie, he ought to baue audience, to be beleeued and followed, folong as he containeth himselfe neare to her, and reiesteth all that is contrarie, be it in words or in fact. For Epicurus, Seneca alledgeth some notable matters of him, redfrom E- whereof it followeth not that he doth allow of his faults, nor of his feet, as is also to be acknowledged in many places. And there can be nothing observed in the life of Seneca, that sheweth him to be an Epicurian or a Libertine. For even in the midst of the abundance and of the great riches he possessed by the liberality of Nero, they saw a great moderatio, witnessed also in his death: not being forbidden to Noblemen to possessed, silver, earthly goods, and moucables of great value, so that such prosperitie do not make them drunke, to cause them despise God and man. As for the last, be they ancient or moderne whose names I am not content to expresse, which very boldly do censure the writings of Seneca: and in agreeing to him in some excellent thing, they afterwards take licence to thinke him rude in his stile, too rigorous a Judge of other mens labours, a foolish ieaster, affected in his discourses, troublesome by reason of his repetitions, withoutart, of small judgement, forgetfull, trusting to his owne wit, curious of light things, and seeking I know not how to be particular, because he would not seeme to have borrowed any thing of any man: these be accusers in the most part of such articles, and no competent Iudges, sauing the honour due to their erudition. For proofe whereof we do exhort the reader to take one whole booke of seneca which he liketh of best, and then to examine it all, if I foeake euill, faying, that he had wrong to be so tossed and played vpon. I thinke that there is nothing in his works, be it in his stile, in the method, or in matter, that could be better performed. Also if they consider what words he vseth, how he joyneth them together, what is the end of his discourses, and what the matters are that he treateth of: they will be lesse rigorous vnto him. Fourt For conclusion, I desire that Senecaes life, referred to his writings, doteach foure things to my things to be felfe, and to all others. The one, that being in meane or base condition, we neuer care to clime vp Sentes. any higher. The other, that if we change a meane estate with another greater, we do remember theformer, to converse modestly with great and small. The third, that we sever passe for any worldly prosperity, but that we be alwaies afraid of it, vntill we be loosed by the meanes of a happie death. And the last, that in our publicke and private converfation, in our thoughts, words, writings, and actions, there shine in vs the love and reverence of true pietie and instice.

THE LIVES OF NINE CELLENT CHIEFTAINES VV AR, TRANSLATED OVT OF LATINE FROM ÆMYLIVS PROBVS.

THE LIFE OF Miltiades.

ILTIADES an ATHENIAN, the sonne of Cimon, being one of the chiefest of his city, as wel because of the ancientry of his race, as for his modestie ioyned to the glory of his predecessors, after he had attained to that age, in which his citizens had occasion not only to hope well of him, but also to affure themselves, that he would be such a one as they iudged him after they knew him: it chanced that the ATHENIANS refoluced to fend a Colonie into CHERRONESVS. And because many men prepared themselues to go thither, and that there was great suite who should leade them, they chose some to go to DELPHES, to inquire of the Oracle who should be their captaine: for a smuch as the Thracians at that time did occupie all those parts thereabouts, and they must be driven out by force of armes. The Prophetesse enioyned the commissioners expressy to choose Militades for chiefe of this people or Colonie, the which should prosper in this enterprise vnder his conduct. With this answer Miltiades accompanied with a chosen companie of men, failed vnto CHERRONESVS, and when he came neare to LEMNOS to subdue the inhabitants of that Iland, he summoned them without any compulsion. They mocking him, answered, That they would then yeeld themselues when Miltiades shold come from ATHENS to LEMNOS with a Northerne wind, which was ful in the faces of them that should come from ATHENS to LEMNOS. Miltiades having no leysure to tarie there, hoised saile, and arrived in CHERRONE SV stand there having in a short time brokenall the troupes of the barbarous people, he made himself Lord of the whole country, built vp some fortreffes, placed his people which he had brought with him in the country, & made them rich, by diverse attempts against the selfesame countreymen. Wherein he prevailed as much by his wisdome, as through his good fortune. For after he had through the valiantnesse of his souldiers ouercome the armies of his enemies, he established his affaires with great equitic, and resolued to remaine in Cherronesvs. So he was there as king, although he had not the name, and attained to this degree of honour as much through his vpright administration of iustice, as for his sufficiencie in warres. This kept him not from doing his duty vnto the ATHENIANS, from whom he was parted: the which was the occasion indeed, that as well those which had fent him thither, as those with whom he imbarked, were content he should continue there alwayes Gouernor. CHERRONESVS being brought to this order, he came again to LEMNOS, and according to the promise of the inhabitants, he demanded that they would yeeld vn their citie vnto him for they promifed to give him their hands when he should come vnto them from his countrey by the North wind, Now (faid he) that his country was in Cherrone svs. The Carians who held Lemnos at that time, seeing things go otherwise then they looked for, and takenhot so much by their words as by the good fortune of their aduersaries, durst not make head, but went straight from thence. So all things prospering according to his desire, he brought all the other Isles called the Cyclades, to be subject to the Athenians.

At the same time Darius king of PERSIA having passed all his armie out of Asia into Ev-ROPE determined to make war with the SCYTHIANS, and made a bridge ouer Danuby to paffe ouer his troupes: the guard of the which in his absence, was committed vnto the Lords which he had brought with him out of Ionia and Aolia, vnto every one of the which he had giuen perpetuall power and gouernment ouer their townes. Supposing by this policie, easily to bring into Subjection all the GREEKEs that dwelt in AsIA, if he gaue the guard of the townes vnto their friends and confederates, that could not escape by any meanes if he were oppeessed. Militade: was of the number of the guards of this bridge. Newes being brought by diuerse messages that Darius had butill successe, and that the Seythians held him hard toit, he per- Millians fivaded the other guards not to lose the occasion that was offered to set GREECE at liberty, confidering that if Darius and his forces he brought with him were overthrown, all EvROPE should beinpeace, and the naturall GREEKES remaining in ASIA should see themselves out of danger, and freed from the domination of the Persians. And this might easily be done, since that by cutting off the bridge, Darius should in few dayes be cut in peeces by the enemies, or should die for penurie with all his armie. Many agreed vnto it: but Istiaus MILETIAN brakethe necke of it, faying, that the kingdome of Darius vpon whom their authoritie depended, made difference betwixt the good of the affaires of them that commanded, and the people that was vnder subjection and government. That if Darius should happen to die, they should be driven out and punished by their citizens and therefore that he was of a contrary mind to all the rest, thinking nothing more profitable, then to fee the kingdome of the Persians established. The greater part of them being of his mind, Miltiades was affraid, for that there were somany witneffes, that the king should soone be aduertised of that which was propounded: wherefore he left CHERRONESVS, and returned againe to ATHENS. Now though his counsel tooke no place, yet he was highly commended, having shewed more regard to the good and libertie of all, then to his owne particular aduancement.

For Darius, he being returned out of Evrope into Asia, his friends counselled him to set vpon GRECE. Whereupon he armed a fleet of flue hundred galleys under the charge of Datis Datistima. and Artaphernes, giving them two hundred thousand footmen, and ten thousand horse, saying keth warre that he would be even with the Athenians, because that the Ionians had in favour of the Greece. ATHENIANS forced the citie of SARDIS, & killed his garrifons. Thefetwo Lieutenants of Darius being arrived in Evboea with their galleys, they presently wanne Eretria, tooke all the inhabitants of the countrey prisoners, and sent them to the king in Asia. From thence they went into Attica, and camped in the plaine of Marathon, which is within fine leagues or thereabouts from ATHENS. The ATHENIANS aftonied at fo great a number of enemies, and foncare vnto them, knew not of whom to demand aide, but of the Laced AM ONIANS, vnto whom they dispatched a very swift footman, a foote Post called Philippides, to aduertise them that they had need to fend them aide, and that presently. In the meane time they chose tenne Captaines to command and gouerne their troupes: Militades was one of them. So there was great disputation among them, to wit, whether they should keepe the walles of their citie, or they should go meete with their enemies to bid them battell. There was none but Militades that reasoned, that there was no delaying or protracting of time, but they must make a campe: and that that would lift up the hearts of the ATHENIANS, when they should see and behold, that they had a good opinion of their vertue & valiant nesse; and that the enemies hearts would faile them, when they should understand that so few men came resolutely to fight with them. At that time the ATHENIANS had no aide from any city but from PLATÆA, which sent them athousand men: who being come, the armie of the GREEXES was compounded but of tenne thousand men in all, who defired nothing but to fight. That was the cause that Miltiades counfell was preferred aboue all the other captaines. For the ATHENIANS respecting his valor, caused their troupes to march into the field, and they camped in a place of aduantage. Then the next morning having disposed their footmen at the foote of the mountaine, which they had in flancke, they gave charge vpon their enemies couragiously, with a new and sure fashion of The Ather fight. For there were trees growing here and there, by meanes whereof they were vnder couert of the rocks, and the trees kept them from being enclosed by the multitude of the enemics horfemen. Nowalthough Datis faw that the place did not fauour and affect him, yet because he had so many men, all his desire was to fight, thinking he should win and obtaine much, Mmmmm 3

if he could ioyne before the aide of the LACED EMONIANS came to them. And thereforehe made an hundred thousand footmen and ten thousand horse to march against them. Then he wentto charge the ATHENIANS, who made excellent proofe of their valiantnes, condering that they having to fight one against ten, they made the PERSIANS flie for life, & so astonished the that in stead of returning backeto their camp, they faued themselues in their ships. See, here was one of the brauest battels that a man can speake of: for neuer such a handful of men ouercameso great forces. Peraduenture it will not be impertinent to shew what reward Militades had for obtaining of so noble a victorie, to the end that all men may know the better, that all commonweales have one disposition. As the honors of the people of Romn were in times past rare and fimple, and by confequent more glorious & to be defired; and now to the contrary more difordered and leffe esteemed: the very same we find to have bin practifed among the ATHENIANS. For all the honour they did vnto this Miltiades, the fauiour of ATHENS, and of all GRECE, Was. that the battel of Marathon having bin painted over the Porch called Pœcile, his image was fet vp the first in rancke of all the Captaines, with the countenance of a man speaking to his soul. diers, and going first to fight. The same people of ATHENS being come to be of greater power. and corrupted by the gifts of those which fued for charge and office in the commonwealth, canfed three hundred statues to be set vp for Demetrius the PHALERIAN.

Afterthis battell, the ATHENIAN'S gaue a fleet of three score and ten gallies vnto Militades, to make war vpon the Iles which had aided the Persians. He copelled some by simple comandeme.s, others by force of arms to yeeld the felues. And not being able by any perswasios to bring the Hemen of Paros to reason (proud because of their riches) he laded his forces, enclosed the towne with trenches, and took from the befieged al meanes either to come by victuals or munition of war:then having fet vp his Gabions and Mantelets, he came neare the wals. He was at the point to win the towne, when one night (not knowne by what mischance) there was a great fire feene vpon firme land in a wood, which they faw from the Isle. This flame made those that were befieged, and them that lay at the fiegethinkethat it was a figne of the fleet of the Persi-ANS, to encourage the PARIANS, and to keepe them from yeelding vp their town. Herupon Miltiades fearing that Darius army by sea was at hand, he set fire of his Mantelets and Gabions, and hoifed faile towards ATHENS, where he arrived with all the gallies he caried out: where with the people were maruelloufly offended. They accused him of treason, that when he might have won Paros by affault, he had taken money of the king, and was returned without fighting, or doing any memorableact. At that time he was ficke of the wounds he had received at the fiege of Pa-ROS: wherefore not being able to defend himselfe in person, his brother stesagoras pleaded his cause, the which having bene debated, he was quit from death, yet condemned to pay a fine of thirtie thousand crownes, to the which they valued the charge of the army in that iourney. And being vnable to pay so great a summe, he was committed to the common prison, and there died. Now this matter of PAROs was but a cloke; and they speake of it thus for another reason, For the tyranny of Pifistratus, who had altered the estate some yeares before, was the cause that the ATHENIANS were affraid of their citizens that were in any credit. Militades, that had had many great & honourable charges feemed that he could no more be brought to line as a private person, considering also that he was given to this desire to command alwayes. For all the time of his abode in Cherrone sys there was no other Lord but he, & also they called him tyrant: but iust, because he had not gotten this authoritie by force of armes, but with the consent of his citizens, and caried himselfe very modestly. Now they take and call them tyrants, which have a perpetuall power in a commonwealth that was free before. Furthermore, Militades was a very gentle person, wonderfull affable, and there was not so meane a man, but might easily come and speake with him. All the townes respected him, he was very famous, and they reputed him for one of the brauest Captaines of GREECE. The people of ATHENS considering these things, had rather condemne this innocent man in a fine, then to be longer in paine to take heed of him.

Pausanias.

Musaias Laced Emonian was a great man, but viconstant in all the parts of his life, furnished with vertues, but ouerwhelmed with vices. It was hethat wanne that so famous victories of the PLATES. For he being Generall of the GREERE armie, this great Lord Mardonius, a Mede by nation, and sonne in law of the king of Persia, the most wife and valiant Captain among all the Persians, followed with two hundred thousand chosen footemen, and twentie thousand horse: he was ouercome, the rest of all his troupes driven out of Paulanias GREECE, and himselfe slaine in the field. This victorie raised vp Pan- gineth the fanists heart to fuch a height, that he beganne to confound the affaires, and to denife great Persians the change in his braine. The first shame he received was, that he having offered a trivet of gold vnto the temple of DELPHES, of the bootie he had gotten vpon the enemies, with an Epigram containing in substance, that vnder his conduct the barbarous people had bene ouerthrowne before PLAT ÆEs, and that acknowledging this victorie, he made this present vnto Apollo: the LIACED EMONIANS rased out these verses, and wrote no other thing but the names of the townes, through whose aide the Persians had bin ouercome. After this battell they sent him againe with an armie of the allies by fea into Cyprvs and Hellespont, to expulse the garrifons of the barbarous people thence. The which he having fortunately executed, he then grew to be more infolent and ambitious then euer.

For, having taken the citie of BYZANCE by force, and made a great number of gentlemen of Persia prisoners, among which were many kinsimen of xerxes, he secretly sent them to him, and gaue it out that they escaped out of prison. Gongylus ERETRIAN did accompany them carying letters to the king, the effect thereof was this, as Thucydides faith: Paufanias, Captaine of SPARTA, knowing that the prisoners of BYZANCE are thy kinsmen, he sendeth them ynto thee for a present, and desireth to be of alliance with thee, and prayeth thee to give him thy daughter in mariage. If thou do it, he promiseth that by his meanes Sparta and all Greece shall be brought vnder thy power. Therefore if it please thee to give eare vnto it, send him a man expresly with whom he may conferre. The king very joyfull and glad for the delinery of fo many friends of his, fent Artabazus presently to Pausanias with letters, in the which he commendeth him, and prayeth him to spare for nothing to bring his promise to passe. If he do, that all shall be granted which he demandeth. Pausanias vnderstanding Xernes mind, resolved resolutely to put his hand to this worke: which the LACBD EMONIANS mistrusting, having sent for him home, they accused him of treason: whereof he was quit, and yet condemned to pay a fine. This was the cause that they sent him not again to the army: but shortly after he returned of his owne mind, and by a rash and cuill grounded Oration, he casily discoursed the tresson. thoughts of his heart. Furthermore, he did not only change his fashion of living after the Laco-NIAN maner, but also of his diet & apparell. For he had a royall pompe, trayning along gowne after the fashion of the Medes, followed with a troupe of the Medes & ÆGYPTIANS for archers of his guard. His table did fo abound in all kinds of dainties after the maner of the P $_{\rm ERS}$ $_{\rm I-}$ ANS, that no man could away withall. He gaue no accesse vnto him but very seldome: to them that would speake with him, he answered very proudly; and commanded with all cruelty, refuling to returne any more to Sparta.

He went to Colones, which is a place in the countrey of Troas, and there plotted all his dangerous practifes against his countrey and himselfe. When the LACED EMONIANS had vnderstanding of it, they fent Ambassadors vnto him with the Scytala, in the which was written, after their accustomed maner, that if he came not into the citie, they would condemne him to death. This letter aftonied him. Yet hoping to escape this imminent danger by force of presents, and by reason of his credite, he went home into his countrey, where being, the Ephores made him to be apprehended, and cast into prison: for it is lawfull for one of the Ephores to take the king, and vie him fo. Neuertheleffe Paulanias loofed himselfe, being not withstanding suspected of euery man: for they had alwayes this opinion of him, that he had intelligence with Xerxes. There are certaine people there called ILOTES, and they are a great number of them, and they plow the lands of the LACED EMONIANS, whom they serue as slaues. It was supposed he did practife with them, vnder promife to make them free men. But because they had no pregnant witnesse to conuince him, they thought they must not condemne so noble a person as he by bare conjectures, but rather to tary till time did reueale it of it selfe. In these businesses, a young man called Argilius, who in his infancie had served Pausanias for a Page, having received letters of him to carieto Artabazus, he doubting lest there were somewhat therein that might hurt him, for of all those that went into Persia about these affaires, not one of the came backe againe: he brake open the scale, and knew by the contents thereof that if he had caried them, he had died for it also the letter mentioned matters whereof Paulanias and Xerxes were agreed. Argilius caried these letters, and put them into the hands of the Ephores. Here is to be noted the mo. deration and gravitie of the LACED EMONIANS, that would not yet take vantage of this detection, to lay hold vpon Paufanias: and resolued not to proceed with rigour, till he first discouered it himselse. And therefore they taught Argilius what they would have him to do.

At TENARE, there is a temple of Neptune, the priviledge whereof the GREEKEs hold for facred and inuiolable. Argilius fled thither, and fate him downe vpon the Altar: neare vnto the which the Ephores made a caue vnder the ground, from whence one might vnderstand all that any body would say vnto Argilius. Some of the Ephores hid themselucs within it. Pausanias vnderstanding that his man was in the priviledge of the temple, went thither marvellously troubled, and began to aske him how this chance happened. Argilius confessed he had opened the letters, and seene the contents of them. Wherewith Paulanias more troubled then before, began to pray him to fay neuer a word, and not to betray him who had done him fo much good that if he would do him that fauour to helpe him out of this trouble, he would make him a great man. The Ephores having heard all this talke, they judged that the furest way was to take him in the citic. Whither they being gone, Pausanias thinking he had appealed Argilius, and thereby affured his affaires, he returned home to his house; and as they were ready to catch him by the coller, he perceived by the countenance of one of the Ephores that called him as if he would have spoken with him, that they went about to intrap him. Wherefore doubling his pace somewhat faster then those that followed him, he saued himselfe within the temple of Minerua, called Chalciecos. But because he should not come out, the Ephores caused the Church doores presently to be mured vp, and the roofe of the temple to be pulled downe, that he might dye the fooner with aire. It is reported that Panfanias mother, being a very old woman, lived at that time: and that the vnderstanding of the wickednesse of her sonne, her selfe brought the first stone to mure him in there. Behold, how Paulanias stained with a shameful death the great glorie he had obtained in the warres. Being brought half dead out of the temple, he died immediatly. Some would have had his bodic caried to the gibbit: others liked northar opinion, and buriedhim farre from the place where he died: from whence he was digged vp again, by commandement of an Oracle of DELPHES, and put in the same place where he died.

THE LIFE OF Thrasybulus.

Or Thrasphulus, he was an Athenian, the some of one called Ly- The praises cus. If we should consider his vertue apart, and leave his fortune behind, it may be we should place him first of all others. And to confesse atroth, I know no man more faithfull, more constant, more nobly minded, and more louing to his countrey, then he. For whereas many have defired (and few executed) to free their countrey from the hands of one onely tyrant: it was his fortune to deliuer his countrey from the violence of thirtie tyrants. But it chanced, I know not how, thathe which went before all others invertue, was put downe by many others in charge and dignitic. In the warres of PELOPONNESVS, Alcibiades did nothing without him, but he on the contrary did many things without Alcibiades, and wanne honour through the goodnesseand excellency of his nature. This notwithstanding, all the exploits of warre ought to be deuided amongst the Chieftaines, souldiers, and fortune: for when armies warlike exmeer, that which hath bene determined in counfel, is executed by the force and valiantneffe of plaint how the foldiers that fight. Wherfore the fouldier may pretend right to that which his General hath done: Fortune challengeth the better part, and may fay, that she hath in such a case sood them in better fleed then all the wisdome of the Generall. Euen so then, this worthy act of Thrashbulus is proper to himfelf. For as the thirty tyrants established by the Spartans, that kept the city of ATHENS in subjection, had banished part of the citizens escaped from the warre, put some to death, and forfeited the goods of others: Thrasphulus was the first and onely man that began to Thrasphulus make warre with them. He was gotten into a strong hold, called PHYLB, in the territorie of Ar- las fee first TICA, having but thirtie men with him in all.

This was the beginning of the health of the ATHENTANS, and the foundation of the liberty vnto the goodliest commonwealth of GRECE. And for as much asthetyrants scorned him and his company, it was the cause of their destruction, and of the preservation of Thrasybulus: and their not caring to fet vpon him and his, made them stronger by the leifure they had given them. The which should teach all to remember this rule that we must never despise our enemy. Our enemy And so it is not spoken in vaine, that the mother of a coward doth neuer weepe. For all his same not so be that went of him, many did not joyne with him: for then those that were best affected, made warre with the tyrants more with their toungs then with their hands. From PHYLE Thrafybulus went to the port of Pyr. As, and did fortific the fortressealled Mynychia: the which the tyrants did affault, but they were repulled with fuch shame, that they suddenly retired to the town with loss of armes and baggage. In this action, Thrasphulus shewed himselfe no lesse wife then valiant: for he commanded his men to touch none that made no refistance, thinking it reasonable that the citizens should pardon one the other; and there was not a man of them hurt, but those that assaulted them. He would strippe none of the dead, nor suffer any thing to be taken from them, but their armes and victuals which he needed. Critias, the chiefe of all the tyrants, having fought very valiantly against Thrasquellus, was flaine at the second affault. After he was dispatched, Pausanias king of Sparta came to the aide of the Athenians, and made peace betwixt Thrasybulus and those which kept the city, with these conditions, that the thirty tyrants, and the tennew governours, which had committed as many cruelties as the tyrants themselves, should be banished, and their goods for seited, without touching any other citizens: and that the fourraignty and gouernement of the estate should be restored a- also the ten gaine vnto the people.

It was another fine device of Thrafybulus, that after he had pacified all matters, and ob- alamin tained great credite in the citie, he made a law that no man should be called in question nor furies pastroubled forthings that were past, and that was called Amnestia, or law of oblinion. But he fed.

was more carefull to keepe it, then to publish it. For some of his followers in his exile, complotted to kill some that were pardoned: but he stopped it by open proclamation, and kept his promise. To recompence these so many good deeds of his, the people gaue him a Crowne of two branches of Bayes, the which got him no enuy, but great glory: because he had obtained itthroughthe good will of his citizens, and not by force. It was wifely faid of Pittacus, one of the seuen Sages: when the MITYLENIAN'S gaue him many thousand of daics worke of lands, I pray you, said he, give me not that thing which is envied of many men, and defired of all the world: of all those I will onely take but a hundred dayes worke, which shall make proofe of my moderation, and of your good affection: for small presents do continue long, but we are no long time owners of great riches. So then Thrasybulus contenting himselfe with this Crowne, he fought for no more, and did thinke that no man was more honored then he. Shortly after, he being arrived in Sicilia with a fleete the which he commanded, his fouldiers were not carefull to keepe good watch in his campe: vpon which occasion, the barbarous people that were befieged, having by night made a fally out of the towne vpon him, they surprifed him, and killed him in his tent.

THE LIFE OF Conon.

Vring the warres of Peloponnesus, Conon Athenian began to deale in the affaires of the commonwealth, and did great service: for he was chosen Colonell of the infanterie, then Admirall, in which a charge he did many goodly exploits. By meanes whereof hegrew to be of fingular reputation amongst all men, and had the gouernement of all the Iles: during which time he wanne Phares a Colony of the LACED EMONIANS. Towards the end of the warre of Peloponnesvs, at what time Lysander ouercame the army of the ATHENIANS vpon the sea coast which they call the river of the Goate, he had then charge of certaine galleyes: howbeit he was not at the battell, which was cause that all cameto nought, for he was a wife and valiant Captaine: infomuch that it was in enery mans mouth, that if he had benerhere, the ATHENIANS had not fustained such a losse. He seeing things brought to so poorean estate, and understanding that his city was besieged, he sought not to hide himselfe to liue in safety, but thought how he might helpe his citizens. For this purpose he went to Pharnaba Zus, a kinfeman and sonne in law of the king of Persia, and gouernour of Ionia and of Lydia, into whose fauour he infinuated himselfe, but with great trouble and much danger. Now when the LACED EMONIANS, after they had subdued the ATHENIANS, in stead of maintaining the alliance made with Artaxerxes, had fent Agefilans to make warrein As 1A, through the perswasion of Tissaphernes, which had forfaken the king (of whom heretofore he was greatly beloued) and loyned with the LACED EMONIANS: Pharnaba Zus was appointed Lieutenant generall of the armie of the Persians to make head against Agesilaus. But in truth Conon commanded all, and nothing was done without his aduice and counsell. It was he that brake the most part of all the intentions and attempts of this great Captaine Agesilaus, being a thing certaine inough, that if Conon had not opposed himselfe, the LACED EMO-NIANS had taken all Asia from the king, vnto the mountaine Taurus. Hereupon Agesilaus being fent for home by the Ephores, because the Bosotians and Athenians had proclaimed warre against Sparta, Conon left not to be euer neare to the Lieutenants of the king of Pers 1 A, and did them great service.

Tissaphernes withdrew himselfe from the court of Persia, the which all men perceived well

inough but the king, with whom he was in great credite and estimation, though he was no more his servant. And it is not to be marvelled at if Artaxerxes could believe nothing, remembring himselfe that by Tisfaphernes meanes he ouercame his brother Cyrus. Conon being fent by Pharnabagus vnto theking to accuse this Tissabernes, he being come to the court, came first to the Captaine of the guard, called Tithraustes, according to the cultome of the Persians. He is chiefest of all the officers of the kingdome, and no man can be suffered to come neare the king to speake with him, without his leaue and licence. He being intreated by Conon to lethim go vnto the Prince. I am contented, faid he, but confider first if thou be determined to speake with him thy felfe, or to deliuer thy mind by writing that thou wouldeft fay vnto him. For if thou come to his presence, thou must kneele to the king; and if thou thinke that grieuous vnto thee, thou maiest execute thy commission by my meanes, as well as by thine owne mouth. As for me, answered Conon, it shall be no troublesome thing to me, to do the king that honour that shall please thee: but I am afraid to do my city dishonor, if I do a thing proper to the barbarous people, and vnfit for that citie which was wont to command other nations. So then he delivered his meffage in writing : which when the king had feene , he was fo moued with the report of fo great a perfon, that he judged Tiffaphernes his enemy, decreed warre against the LACEDEMONI-ANS, and fuffered Conon to make choise of such a man as he would, to distribute the money neceffary to defray the charge of this warre. Conon made this answer, that this election pertained nothing to him, but to the king that knew his feruants best; yet in his opinion; this charge should be best bestowed upon Pharnabazus. He was fent backe with great presents to the maritime townes, to command the Cypriors, Phenicians, and others dwelling upon this coaft to put galleys in readinesse, and to arme a seete that might keepe the seasthenext Sommer, under the conduct of Pharnabazus and of Conon, who had so required it.

The LACED EMONIANS being advertised thereof, were amazed, perceiving well that they were to make another manner of warre then with the barbarous people. For they faw that they must needs come to fight against a valiant and wise Captaine, having the kings treasure in his hands, and that had a fmuch and better direction and forces then they. With this thought they gathered together great store of shipping, and imbarked themselves under the conduct of Pilander. Conon met with them neare vnto CNIDOS, gaue them battell, made them flie, tooke flore of conn rais galleys, and funke a great number of them. By meanes of this victory, ATHENS & all GREECE guifheth the fubiect to the dominion of the LACED AMONIANS, were fet at liberty. Conon returned againe to his countrey with part of these galleys, built vp againe the wals of ATHENS and of the hauen of PIRÆA, which had bene ouerthrowne by Lyfander, and presented his citizens with 30000. crownes which Pharnabazus had given him. But that which happeneth oftentimes vnto other men, chanced also vnto Conon, that is, to have leffecourage in prosperity, then in adversitie. For now that he had ouercome the fleete of the PELOPONNESIANS, thinking he had taken fufficientreuenge of the wrongs received by his countrey, he began to embrace in his mind imaginations too high for his carriage: although this was good and commendable in his enterprife, that he had rather make his owne countrey great and rich, then the king of Persia. Therefore he being now growne into wonderfull credite, not onely among st the barbarous people, but also amongst all the cities of GRBBCB, after this battel of CNIDOs, he began vnderhand to practise the meanes to restore Ionia and Æolia to be subject againe to the common wealth of the A-THENIANS. His practices being discovered, Tiribazus governor of Sardis, sent to pray him to come to him, to be fent in Ambassage to the king. Conon straight obeying his commande.

Aphicrates.

Phicrates the Athenian was famous, not fo much for his divers exploits or for the greatnesse of them, as for his militarie disciplines for he was fuch a chieftaine of warre, that they compared him vnto the brauest men of his time, and they did not set him behind any of those that had gone before him. He had bene in many warres, had comman. ded armies oftentimes, he neuer had misfortune by his owne fault, he cuer ouercame by wisedome: his vnderstanding reaching so far, that he brought in many good things neuer seene before in the art militarie: and made some of them better that were in vse. He altered the armes of footmen: and where before him the Captaines did vse great targets, short partisans, and little fwords: he to the contrarie brought light bucklers, to the end his men should be lighter to remoue, and to runne to give charge. He made the partifans greater by halfe, and the swords longer. He changed also the corslets, and in stead of iron and copper, he made them of canuasse well wrought together, which made the fouldiers much lighter: for being eased of that weight, they had meanes to defend themselues nimbly against blowes, & were ready besides to give charge vponthe enemy. He made warre with the THRACIANS, and recftablished Seuthes againe in his kingdome, an allie of the ATHENIANS, Being at CORINTH, he observed so good discipline in his armie, that they neuer saw any souldiers in GREECE, better disposed, nor more obedientto their Colonel then they were. To be short, he did vse them to ranke themselues so well in battell, without helpe of the Captaine, fo foone as euer the Generall had given them the figne to fight, that it seemed expresly as if the most expert Chiefetaine of warre had imbattelled

With such an army he affailed the LACED AMONIANS, which was a most famous act through all GREECE; and in this warre he put all their forces to flight, which wanne him great honour. And as Artaxerxes was ready to fet vpon the king of Æ GYPT, he demanded of the A-THENIANS Captaine Iphicrates, tobe the chiefe leader of all the strangers troupes, to the number of twelue thousand men. Whom he so well trained and disciplined, that as the FABIAN soldiers had bin famous among the ROMAINS, so in GREECE they spake of none but of Iphicratian fouldiers. Afterwards being gone to aide the Spartans, he staied Epaminondas roundly: and had not he come, the THEBANS would neuer haue returned backe before they had taken and burnt the citie of Sparta. He was a man of a ftout heart, and of a high stature, having the report and countenance of a Soueraigne captain, so that he made all men wonder at him that faw him: but he was flouthfull and impatient, as Theopompus faith, but otherwise a good and faithfull citizen, whereof he made proofe among others, especially in keeping Perdiccas and Philip the sons of Amyntas Macedonian, fafe. For Euridice their mother coming with them for refuge vnto Iphicrates, after the death of Amontas, he spared no meanes of his owne to defend them. He liued a long time, being in good credite with his citizens, fauing that on a time during the warres of the allies he was criminally accused with Timotheus; howbeit he cleared himselfe, and was quit by iudgement. His wife was Thressa, daughter of king Cotys: and of her he had a sonne called Menestheus: who being asked which he loued best, either his father, or his mother: My mother, said he. Whereat euery man musing: Maruell not, answered he, I have reason to say so. For my father, as much as was in him, begat me a

THE LIFE OF Chabrias.

Habrias was an Athenian, and was placed in ranke of excellent Captaines. So hath he done many things worthie of memorie, Amongst others, the stratageme he shewed at the battell of THERES is famous, chabring his where he was to aide the Borotians, For, that great Captaine Ageli- Bratageme. law reioycing because of his victorie, and that he had made all the troupes at the Thebans pay fun away, Chabrias stood still with them that were left of his battalion, teaching the fouldiers to refift the charge of the enemies, casting downe their pikes, and covering themselves with their bucklers vpon one knee. Azesilaus moued with this noneltie, durst not runne into them, but sounded the retreat, to keepe his men that they should paffe no further. This act was forenowmed through GRECE, that Chabrias caused a statue to be made of him in the state about mentioned, the which the ATHENIANS set up for him in the great market place. Afterwards the wreftlers, and other fuch kind of people followed this fashion of erection of statues, which they descrued for their victories. To come againe to Chabrias, he made many warres in Evrope, in the qualitie of Generall of the ATHENIANS, and went also of his voluntarie will to make warre in Acypy, in the feruice of Nedanebos whom he fet againe into his kingdome. He did the like in CYPRVS, whither the ATHENIANS fent him of purpose to helpe Euggoras, and would not depart thence before he had first subdued all the Isle, for the which the ATHENTANS wan great honour, Inthese businesses, warre fell out betwixt the Per-SIANS and AGYPTIANS. They of ATHENS were allies of Artaxerxes, and the Spartans tooke part with AGYPT. King Agefilaus did greatly inuade the PERSIANS, and carried great booties away. Chabricas confidering that, and giving no place to Agefilaus, went of his owne head to aide the ÆGYPTIANS, who made him their Admirall, and gaue the charge of the armie by land ynto Ageilans. Thenthe Lieutenants of the king of Persia fent vnto Athens, to complaine that Chabrias made warre with the ÆGYPTIANS against their king. The ATHENIANS sent for Chabries immediatly to appeare in person, threatening him to condemne him to death, if he were not there by the day appointed. This meffage made him to come again to ATHENS , where he taried no longer then needs he must. For the Citizens bare him no great good will, because he carried himselfe so stately, and would be so merry, that the people enuied him. This vice reigneth chabries enuied commonly in those great and free townes, that glorie is ever accompanied with enuie, and they for his faidiwillingly speake ill of them whom they see to be great: and to be short, the poore cannot abide ""se. wealthie and rich men. Therefore Chabrias didabfent himselfe out of the Citic as much as he could possible, and he was not alone in that, for almost all the chiefest of the Citie did the like: thinking themselves fafe from the teeth of the envious, so long as they were farre off from the fight of their citizens. Therefore Conon lived for the most part of his time in the Isle of Cyprys, Iphicrates in THRACIA, Timotheus in LESBOS, Cares in SYGHEA. As for Cares, he was not to be likened in any respect vnto the others, in exploits, nor in manner of life: and yet he was honored in the Citie of ATHENS, and had great meanes.

As for Chabries, he died in the war of the allies in this maner. The ATHENIANS made war with The manner of the Islanders of Chio, at what time Chabrias had no charge in the armie by sea. Notwithstan- Chabrias death, ding he had more authoritie then all the Captains, and the fouldiers esteemed him more then any other of the comanders: which was the cause of his death. For striving to enter the first into the hauen, and commanding the Pylote to row right thither, it was his destruction; for being moored there within, the other ships followed him not. Whereupon the enemies compassed him in : but as hefought valiantly, his galley being beaten with the fourre of another veffell, began to leake, and to finke to the bottome. He feeing there was no way for him to escape, because the fleet of the Athenians was too farre off to receive him in if he should have attempted to haue fwomme, he hadrather die then leaue his armes, and forfake the galley which caried him. The others, they tooke another course, and faued themselves by strength of their armes. But he effeeming an honest death to be more excellent then a shamefull life, fighting very neare, was killed by the enemies with darts.

Timotheus.

The commenda sion of Timo shew and his exploits.

Imotheus the sonne of Conon, a Captaine of ATHENS, did by many ver. tues amplifie the glorie received of his father. For he was an eloquent man, diligent, painfull, expert in militarie discipline, and a great Polititian. He hath executed greathings, whereof the most notable are these, to wit: he subdued the Olynthians and Byzantines: he wanted the office of Sancia the second the former warres had wanne the citie of Samos, the fiege whereof in the former warres had I flood the Athenians in the fumme of twelve hundred talents. He deliuered it vnto the people freely without any charge to them. He made warre with king Cotys, and brought of the bootie he had gotten there vnto the Treasurie, the like summe of twelve hundred talents. He also raised the siege that was before Cyzica, and went with Agefilaus to the aide of Ariobarzanes, of whom having receiued money, he had rather his citizens should buy townes and lands, then to carrie it home to his lodging. Therefore he iouned ERICTHONE and SESTOS to the figniorie of ATHENS. Afterwards having charge of the armie by fea, he inuaded Peloponnesvs, spoiled all the territorie of Sparta, and had all their thips in chase. He brought the Corcyrean's under the subjection of the ATHENIANS, and drew into their alliance the Epirots, ATHAMANES, and CHAONIANS, and all the people vpon that fea coast. The which made the LACED EMONIANS leave their so long old quarrell, and of their owne good wils let the ATHENTAN'S haue the principalitie of the fea: treating peace with these conditions, that the ATHENIANS should be Generals vpon

This victorie didio please the Athenians, that there was then first of all an altar built to the common Peace, and they did ordaine a pillow should be made for that goddesse. Furthermore, that fuch a glorious act should remaine for perpetuitie, they raised up a statue unto Timothem in the market place, by ordinance of the people, which was an honour that neuer man received before, to wit, that the people having granted a statue for the father, they should also give one to the fonne. By this meanes the statue of the sonne so freshly set up, renewed the memorie of the father. Now Timotheus being very old, dealing no more in affaires of the commonwealth, they began afresh to torment the Athenians of all fides. Samos and Hellespont shrunke backe and revolted, Philip king of MACEDON, who began to waxe great, plotted wonderfull things in his head, Chares was fent against him to make head. But they thinking him not sufficient to repulse Philip, they therefore sent Menestheus the sonne of Iphicrates, sonne in law to Timotheus, and made him Colonell, gaue him the charge of the affaires of the warres, having for his counfellers, his father, and father in law, braue Captaines, wife and expert men to direct him with their counsell: their authoritie being so great, that every man hoped that all that was lost should be recourred agains by their meanes. They pointing for Samos, Chares that had heard newes of it, failed up and downe that coast, to the end nothing should be done in his absence. Drawing neare to the Isle a storme arose, and to defend themselues against it, the two old Captaines strake faile, and hulled, going no further into the sea. Chares to the contrarie vpon a head, not respecting them that had seene more then he, held on his course, thinking to haue found an occafion as he wished, and sent as well to Timotheus as to Iphicrates, that they should follow, him. But having had evill successe, and lost many of his shippes, he fell backe againe to that verie place from whence he came, and sent letters to the people of ATHENS of this effect, that he had easily taken Samos, if Timotheus and Iphicrates had not forsaken him at his need. Vpon this ac-Timotheus culation they were fummoned to appeare in person by this bold people, suspitious, vinconstant, e- prongfully accunemy and enuious of another mans greatnesse, and are charged to be traitors to the common-ned wealth. Timothem was condemned, and a fine fet vpon his head of fixty thousand crownes. Inhierates constrained by the importunitie of his vnthankfull citizens, went for a time to CHALCIS. After Timothem death, the people repenting their fentence, abated nine parts of the fum aboue named, and commanded Conon, the fonne of the deceaffed, to furnish fixe thousand crownes for thereparation of a pane of the wall. Here is to be noted a wonderfull revolution of the affaires of this world: for the yong sonne was constrained at his owne charges (to the great dishonour of his house) to repaire the wals, the which his grandfather Conon had made vp with the booty gotten of the enemies. We could alledge many examples of the modesty and wisedome of Timetheus: but we will adde for the end a matter whereby may be easily coniectured, how much he was esteemed of the GREEKES. Being yong he was accused, and brought before the Judge, whereupon his friends and familiars came out of all parts into ATHENS to defend him, and amongst others the tyrant lason, who was at that time the mightiest Lord of all Greece. This tyrant was neuer affured in his owne countrey without his guard, and yet he came without any traine to ATHENS, esteeming so much his host Timotheus, that he had rather hazard his life, then faile his friend in time of necessitie, Notwithstanding this, shortly after Timotheus made Timotheus prewarre with Iason, by the commandement of the people, thinking that to obey his countrey, mon profit before and to maintaine the right of the same, is a more denout thing, then to sauour a private friend, private friend. After this last age, which tooke away Iphicrates, Chabrias, and Timotheus, Captaines of A. Ing. THENS, they could never find in the commonwealth after their death, any Chieftaine of warre. that deferueth any memorie of them.

Datames.

Profently enter into the life of a most valiant and wife Captaine, a Datames a wife mong all the barbarous: Hamilear and Hanniball of Carthage ex. and raliantes; cepted. We will speake somewhat more amply of this man, for that the saine. most part of his exploits are little knowne, and also because he had obtained his victories not so much by force of armes, as by his wisedome: tained his victories not so much by force of armes, as by his wisedome:
a vertue in the which he did surpasse all the men of his time. But this cannot be judged, vnlesse we make him knowne in all particulars. Datames the source of Camellares a CARLAN, and of a SCYTHAN, was at tames the sonne of Camissares a Carian, and of a Scythian, was at the beginning a souldier of the guard of the pallace of Artaxerxes. His father Camillares, because of his valiantnesse and direction in the wars, and for that he had done many good services vnto the king, was made Gouernour of CILICIA, neare vnto CAPPA-DOCIA, where the Leve OSYRIANS dwell. As for Datames, following the warres, he made proofe of his valour in the warre which Artaxerxes had against the CADVCIANS: where many men being slaine on both sides, he fought so valiantly, that his father being killed, he had his Datamer by his authoritie and place of Goneryour of CILICIA. He shewed himselfe no lesse valiant in warre, forsitude and then Antophradates did by the kings commandement vnto those that had rebelled. For, by rator obtained the direction of Datames, the enemies that were now entredinto the Persians campe, were the place that had, repulfed, and all the armie of the kings in fafetie: the which was the cause of his calling and aduancement vnto higher charges. There was at that time in PAPHLAGONIA a Gouernour called Thyus, descended of an ancient race of one Pylamenes, whom Homer saith, was slaine by Patroclus in the warre of Trois. He not regarding the kings will and commandements, Nunnn 2 who therefore resolued to make warre with him, and gaue the charge of it vnto Datames, cofin germane to Thrus. By reason of kindred, Darames would proue by all meanes he could to draw his kinfman to fome conformitie before he tooke armes: he went vnto him without any traine little thinking that his friend would have laid any ambush for him, but he had almost bene taken tardie, for This lought to surprise him, and to cut his throate. Datames mother, Aunt vnto Thrus, being told what was practifed against her sonne, she did aduertise him in so good time. that he escaped with speed, and proclaimed warre against his aduersarie. And although that in the pursue of this warre, he was forfaken of Ariobarzanes, Gouernour of Lydia, of Ionia, and of all Phrygra, yet helet not to go further: he tooke Thyus prisoner with his wife and children: and then very carefully tooke order that no man but himself should carie newes of it to the king. So following that purpose, without any mans primitie he arrived at the Court, and the next morning apparelled Thyus (a tall man and of a terrible grimme looke, being blacke haired, and wearing his haire long) with a rich robe, such as great Lords vie to weare. He apparelled himselfe like a countrey man, in a Lion tawnie coate, with a cloke of diverse colours, and an hunters hate having in his right hand a club, and in his left hand a leace, vnto the which Thyes was tyed, who went before, as if he had led some sauage beast he had taken in the chase a hunting. They all ran to fee this new monster thus difguised, and those which knew Thyus went presently and told the king of it, who at the first would beleeve nothing, but sent Pharnabazis to fee what it was. So when he had told him what had happened, he made this pompe come in prefently, and the king tooke great pleasure to see it, but specially to see so mightie a Prince beyond all hope

Therefore after he had given sumptuous presents vnto Datames, he sent him vnto the armie that was leavied under the conduct of Pharmabazus and Tithransles, to make warre in Agypt, and ordained that he should have as much authoritie as they. Now after that the king had sent for Pharmabazus, all the charge of the warres was committed to Datames. Who being greatly occupied about leavies of men to go into Ægyrt, he received letters from the king, commanding him to inuade a Lord called Apis, who held CATAONIA, a province ioyning neare to CAPPA-DOCIA, beyond CILICIA, a mountaine countrey well furnished with fortresses, that despited the king, and made inualions upon the Prouinces thereabouts, spoiling victuals and all things else that were carried to the king. Though Datames was farre from that place, and had other affaires of great importance in hand, yet he determined to obey the king, and suddenly imbarked himfelfe with a finall number of resolute men, thinking (that which came to passe) that with a few men he should sooner surprise a man not dreaming of any such matter, then with a great armie to go and affaile him. He being arrived in CILICIA, landed, then marched day and night ouer mount Taurus, and came to the place where he would be the enquireth for A/pis, and vnderstandeth that he was not farre off a hunting. But as he stayed for his comming, A/pis knew that he was come, and immediatly disposed of his Pisidians and others of his traine to make head. Datames knowing this refolution, takes his armes, made his men march, and galloped to Datames taketh the place where A/pis was, who feeing him come with fuch a furie, he loft his courage to defend Abis, and fin. himselfe, and presently yeelded. Datames made him to be bound, and sent him by Mithridates to the king. Hereupon Areaxerxes confidering better what he had done, drawing his Lieutenant farre from his armie, to fend him in commission about a matter of lesse consequence, being angrie with himselfe, sent a messenger to the campe, thinking Datames was not yet gone from thence, to tell him that he should not go. But before this messenger came to the armie, he met them by the way that brought Afpu. This fo fudden execution wanne Datames the kings good fauour, but made him very much hated of the Courtiers, feeing one onely man more made of then all the rest, which was the cause that they all joyned together to destroy him.

Pandates Treasurer of the spare, and Datames friend, did aduertise him by expresse letters, that he flood in great danger, if any finister fortune happened whilest he should command the armic in AGYPT; that it is the custome of kings to impute all misfortunes to their feruants that chance in their affaires, and to attribute the good fuccesse vnto themselues: and this makes them very eafily incline to the extermination of them, of whom report is made, that they have not done that which was committed to their charge; and as for him, that he should so much the more stand in feare, because those which could do most with the king, were his greatest enemies. Datames having received these letters in his campe, and knowing that they carried truth with them, he resolved to for sake the king: which doing, notwith standing he committed no because of bis breach of his fidelitie. For he left Androcles MAGNESIAN Generall of the armie, and for himselfe fakethelse king, he went with his men into CAPPADOCIA; afterwards he wan PAPHLAGONIA which was hard by it, without shewing himselfe either friend or enemie of the king. He secretly contracted friendthip with Ariobarzanes, affembled forces, and gaue the guard of the townes of warre vnto those he trusted best, but the winter did let him that his affaires went not forward. He vinderstandeth that the PISIDIANS did leavie some troupes to set upon him, which caused him to send his sonne Aridous before with an armie. The yong man being flaine at an encounter, the father marched right thither with his men, hiding his griefe as much as he could possible, because he desired to meete with his enemies, before those that followed him should heare of his losse, being afraid left the newes of the death of this yong Lord (hould kil their hearts. So being come to the place where he pretended, he camped in fuch fort, that the multitude of his enemics could not enclose him nor keepe him from comming to fight when he thought good. He brought with him Mithrobarzanes his father in law, who was Colonell of the horsemen. He perceiting the affaires of his fon in law in so poore an estate, for sooke him to go yeeld himselfe to the enemies. Datames A five strate. being told of it, iudged that his fouldiers if they once perceived that his father in law had for faken geme. him, they would allo follow his example: wherfore to preuent all, he gaue it out that Mithrobarzanes was gone by his commandement, pretending to yeeld themselves to the enemies, to the end with more ease and aduantage to cut them in peeces; and therefore that there was no reason to leave fuch a man fo far from them, but they must needs follow him with speed. So that they flanding to it luftily, the enemies could not refift, confidering they should be charged within and without their campe. So having thought that the best way in the world, he marcheth into the field with his troupes, and followeth Mithrobarzanes, who did but newly yeeld themselves to the enemies, when Datames appeared, who put out the fignall of batfell. The PISIDIANS troubled with this strange fight, did suspect that Mithrobarzanes, and his would betray them, and that they were come of purpose to do them some mischiefe. Thereupon they vehemently gaue charge vpon these traitors, who not knowing what to think of such a charge, were constrain ned to fight against them vnto whom they had yeelded themselves, and to return evnto them whom they had forfaken. But the one and the other not knowing them any whit, in a short time these wicked men were cut in peeces. So withal Datames setteth vpon the Pisidians who made head against him, passed through them, and brake them at the first charge, pursued them that fled, flue a great number of them, and was maister of their campe. Note here how wifely (and all done at one time) he punished the traitors, and put his enemies to slight, turning that to good, which was deuised for the ouerthrow of him and his. This is the most braue and most speedic executed stratageme of a Chiestaine in wars, that can be found in histories.

Notwithstanding that, this great person was for faken of his eldest some Scifmas, who went to The son betray. the king to aduertife him that his father was revolted. This troubled drtaxer wes greatly, knowing abite father. that he had to deale with a valiant and a wife Captaine, who boldly did fet you any enterprife with discretion. Thereupon he sent Antophradates into Cappadocia, whom Datames tooke paines to go and meete, to preuent him that he should not win the straight of CILICIA. But being long affembling his forces, and that hope being frustrate, he chose with those few men that followed him fuch a place, that his enemies could not enclose him, nor passe, but that he should that them up in very vnwholfome places, nor hurt him when he liked to joyne in fight, Now though Antophradates vnderstood somwhat of that, yethe made account that it was more expedient for him to ioyne then to flie from the lift, having fo great forces. He had 20000 horse, and 100000. footmen, which they call GARDATES, with 3000. flings of the fame name. Furthermore, he had 8000. Cappad octans, 10000. Armenians, 5000. Papelagonians, 10000. Perygi-ANS, 5000. LY DIANS, and about 3000. ASPEN DIANS and PIST DIANS, 2000, CILICIANS, as many CAPTANIAN S, and 2000. GREEKS in pay, befides a great nuber of light armed men. Against this world offorces, Datames could hope no more but in his direction; and in the commodity of the place where he camped for he had not the twentith part fo many men. Yet trufting to himfelfe, to the place, and to the valour of his men, he came to fight, and put to the fword many thousands of his enemies, having lost of his side but one thousand of his men. For this cause he fet up the next day in the field a figne of triumph where the battell was fought. So being remoued from thence, as he was the weaker in number of men, he to the contrarie remained victor in all skirmishes and fights, and neuer came to hands but he put his enemieto the worse: in the which he had oftentimes very good successe, because he knew all the waies, and did wifely consider his affaires. Antophradates seeing the king lost more in these warres then he got he perswaded Datames to fall to agreement, and to make his peace with the king. Though Datames hadno great trust in that, yet he accepted the condition, and said he would fend ambassadours vnto Artaxerxes. And thus the warre of the king ended against Datames. And for Antophradates, he retiredinto Phrygia.

Datames warie

The manner of Mithridates firstageme.

But the king being vexed to the heart against Datames, considering that he could not prevaile against him by armes, sought to make him away by treason. Datames looked warily to his waies, against station, and avoided many ambushes. As on a time, having understanding that some pretending to be his friends had laid a plot for him, although his enemies had given him intelligence of it, yet he thought, that as it was not a thing lightly to be beleeved, so was it not altogether to be discredited; whereupon he resolued to trie whether the report was true or false. Therefore he set forward to the place where it was told him this ambush was laid but he chose amongst his men one that was of his height, he gaue him his furniture, and made him march in the rank which he was wont to hold. He on the other fide apparelled like a fouldier, went with the archers of the guard. Those which lay in ambush, deceived by the order and furniture, assoone as they saw their time, began to fet youn the supposed Datames. But the right Datames had warned them before with whom he marched, to be readie to do all as he did. He feeing then these traitors runs ning he threw darts at them, and so did all those that were in his companie so that the other fell to the ground before they could come neare him whom they would furprife. Now notwithstanding all this, this so warie and subtill Captaine was in the end betrayed by the deceit of Mithridates the fonne of Ariobarzanes, who promifed the king to do the deed, fo that he would afterwards fuffer him to do what he thought good, without being called in question any maner of way. The king consented vnto it, and gaue his hand vpon it after the custome of the PBR STANS, to make him more affired Mithridates having the kings word, made flew to be fworne enemy vnto Artaxerxes, he gathered troupes together, and by meanes treateth friendship with Datames he entreth with a maine army into the kings country, befregeth and taketh fortreffes, carieth away great bootie, he giveth part of it to his fouldiers, he fendeth the rest vnto Datames, and delivereth many fortresses and holds into his hands. So having continued this course a reasomable time, Datames began wholly to beleeue that Mithridates had vndertaken a warre which he would neuer leave, and this traitor gave him great occasions to thinke so. For fearing lest Datames would mistrust some amoust, he sought not to speake with him, nor went about to meete together, but without enterview he entertained his alliance fo finely, that these two men seemed both one, not fo much for mutuall benefit, as for a common hatred conceived against the king. When he faw his finare well laid, he wrote to Datames, that time required they should affemble great forces to make warre against the king: and if he thought good, he would appoint a place where they might one fee another, and conferre together. Datames found this aduice good, and fo they appointed a day to meete together, and place where they might speake personally one appointed for en- with the other. Some dayes before Mitbridates came to the place, seconded with another in whom he put great truft, he hid poignards separated in diuerse places, and did carefully marke the places where they were laid. The day being come of their talking together, both of them fent men to discouer the place, and to search one the other, because they should be without weapons. That being done, they enter into talke, and after they had spoken some time together, they departed for that Datames was gone a good way off. And as for Mithridates, because he went to his men (to gitte no occasion of ill thought) he cometh to the same place againe where they had Spoken together, and fate him downe in a place where there was a poignard hidden, faining to be wearie, and to refresh himselfe a litle. Then he sent for Datames, under colour that he had forgotten to tell him fome thing. In the meane time he tooke the poignard out of the place where it was hidden, drew it, and put it naked under his robe. And feeing Datames, told him they must go a litle afide, and that he had discouered a place directly ouer against them very fit to campe in. Datames traite. He began to show him the place with his finger: and as Datames turned to see what it was, this rough murdered traitor stabbedhim with his poiguard, and made an end of killing of him before any of his men by Milbridger, could come to helpe him. See here how through pretence of friendship he was surprised, who had entrapped fo many others by his valiant direction, but none by treaton,

Amilear the fonne of Hanniball, furnamed Barcas, a CARTHAGINIAN Captaine, being very yong began to command an armie that was in Sicilia, in the end of the first warre of Africke. Before his comming thither the CARTHAGINIANS had very ill successe both by sea mandland: but so soone as he led the army, he never gave place to the Hamilton apress enemy, and gaue him no advantage to hurt him, but to the contrarie peromleader. he found many an occasion to draw them to fight, wherein he had the vantage. Which being done, although the CARTHAGINIANS had well-neare lost all that they held in Sicilia, yet he kept the City of Exix fowell, as it feemed that there had never bene warre made in that quarter. In the meane time the Carthaginians having loft a battell at sea neare vnto the Iles Ægates, against Catulus Luctatius a Romane Confull, they determined to leave armes, and gave all the charge vnto Hamilear to treate of peace. For his part he defired nothing but warre: yet feeing his towne inwant of money and meanes, and in danger to finke vnder their burthen, he concluded that they must make peace. Yet so notwithstanding he resolved with himselfe, that assoone as all matters were pacified, he would make warre againe, and set vpon the Romanes, either to make them Lords of all, or else to compell them to be subject. With this minde he entred into parley of peace, where he shewed himselfe so stout, that as Catulus declared he would agree to nothing, before Hamilear and his fouldiers which had kept ERIX had layed downe their armes, and were gaue out of Sicilia, he made answer that he would rather dye in the ruines of Hamilton refuhis countrey, then to returne home with fuch shame; and that honour would not suffer him to salt o gold royeeld up his armes to his enemies, which his countrey had put into his hands to be employed conditions of against them. So Catulus let him go with this obstinate resolution.

But when Hamilear was arrived at Carthage, he saw matters go farre otherwise then he hoped for. For during the long wars against the enemies abroad, there was mischiefe sprong vp among them within: which went on so fiercely, that CARTHAGE was neuer in so great danger but when it was altogether destroyed. First of all, the mercenarie souldiers that had bene in the warres against the ROMANES, to the number of 20000 they rebelling, made all Africks rile, and they befreged Carthage. The Carthaginians being greatly afraid of formany euils, they demanded aide of the Romanes, which they granted. But in the end, when all was thought to be in a desperate case, they chose Hamilear their Captaine Generall, who did not onely driue the enemies farre from the towne, which were in number aboue an hundred thoufand fighting men, but he did also shutthem up in such straights, that the most part of them died Hamilton oneroffamine, and the rest were slaine. Furthermore, he brought the Cities which had revolted, vn- shroweth the enerder the obedience againe of CARTHAGE, and amongst others VTICA, and HIPPONA, two of mies of his count. the strongest Cities of Africke, But not staying there, he extended the limits of the signiory of CARTHAGE, and pacified all Africke in such fort, that it seemed there had bene no warre of long time.

Now having done all things according to his mind, he bearing ill will to the ROMANES, and hoping to be renenged; to finde a more easie way to draw them to warre, he practised so well that he was chosen Generall, and they fent him with an army into Spaine, whither he car-Hamilton shofen ried with him his sonne Hanniball nine yeares old, and another faire yong gentleman called the Remanes, and Hasdruball, whom many judged to be loued of Hamilear otherwise then was fit for honest men. Sent into Spaine. For there were many alwayes that could not containe themselues from speaking euill of this great Captaine. Which was the cause that the gouernour of Hasaruball did forbid him to come no more to Hamilear, who afterwards gaue him his daughter in marriage, fo that they began againe to meete together. For by the custome of the countrey they could not forbid a sonne in Nnnnn 4 law, to frequent with his father in law. We have made mention of Haldruball, because that after Hamilear was flaine, he was made chiefe of the army, which did great exploits vnder his conduct. Euen so he was the first, that by presents and gifts corrupted the ancient manners of the CARTHAGINIANS. After his death, Hanniball had the charge of the armie, with the confent of all the men of warre. As for Hamilear, he having passed the sea, entred into Spaine, and did great things there with good successe. He subdued many warlike nations, enriched all Africks with horses, with armes, with men, and with money. As he had thought to haue transported Examilear Saines, the warre from thence into ITALIE, nine yeares after his comming into Spaine, he was slaine in a battell against the Vectors. The deadly hate he bare vnto the Romanes, seemeth to have kindledthe second warre with Africke. For his some Hanniball was brought to this passe, by the continual adjurations of his father, that he had rather destroy himselfe, then to faile his helpe against the ROMANES.

wearing garlands of flowers vpontheir heads, facrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vponthe newes of some great obtained victory. And this common ioy was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honorable curtesies the whole Senate and people did bestow on their Ladies. For they were all throughly perswaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the Ladies only were cause of the sauing of the city, and deliuering themselues from the instant danger of the warre. Wherupon the Senate ordained, that the Magistrates to gratiste and honor these Ladies, should graunt them all that they would require. And they only requested that they would build a temperature that they would require the same of the ple of Fortune for the women, vnto the building whereof they offered themselues to defray the whole charge of the facrifices, and other ceremonies belonging to the feruice of the gods. Neuertheleffe, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardneffe, ordained, that the temple and image should be made at the common charge of the city. Notwithstanding that, the Ladies gathered money among them, and made with the same a second image of Fortune; which the ROMAINES say did speake as they offered her vp in the temple, and did set her in her place: and they affirme, that the spake these words: Ladies, ye have devoutly offered mevp. Moreover, that The spake that twise together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were, and are not to be creflake to the dited: For to fee images that feeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or bloudie, it is not a thing vnpossible. For wood and stone do commonly receiue certaine moisture, whereofare ingendred humours, which do yeeld of themselues, or do take of the aire, many forts and kinds of fpots and colours by which fignes and tokens it is not amisse, methinke, that the gods forectimes do warne men of things to come. And it is possible also that these images and statues do sometimes put forth sound; like vitto sighes or mourning, when in the middest or botome of the same, there is made some violent separation, or breaking as under of things, because and with the status has been as a sufficient sound. blowne or deuised therein: but that a body which hath neither life nor soule, should have any direct or exquisite words formed in it by expresse voice, that is altogether unpossible. For the foulc, nor god himselfe can distinctly speake without a body, having necessary organs and instruments meet for the parts of the same, of forme and otter distinct words. But where stories many times do force vs to beleeue athing reported to be true, by many graue testimonies: there we must fay, that it is some passion contrary to our fine natural senses, which being begotten in the imaginative part or vad antanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfe, euen as we do in our fleeping. For many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare, and we imagine we feethat we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously given to think on heauenly things, fo as they can no way be drawne from beleeuing that which is spoken of them, they have this reason to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpon; that is, the omnipotencie of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no maner of resemblance or likenesse of proportion vnto ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our mouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpossible to vs, or do bring forth and deuise things, aboue mans common reach and vnderstanding, we must not therfore think it vnpossible at all. For if in other things he is farre contrary to vs, much more in his works and secret operations, he far passeth all the rest:but the most part of Gods doings, as Herachtus saith, for lack of faith, are hidden and vnknowne vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the city of ANTIVM from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authority, fought diverse meanes to make him away, thinking if he let slipt that present time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherfore Tullus having procured many other of his confederacy, required Martius, might be deposed from his estate, to render vp account to the Volsces of his charge and gouernement. Martius fearing to become a private man againe vnder Tullus being Generall (whose authority was greater otherwise, then any other among all the Volsces) answered: He was willing to give vp his charge, and would refigne it into the hands of the Lords of the Volsces, if they did al command him, as by al their commandment he received it. And moreover, that he would not refuse even at that present to give vp an account vnto the people, if they would tary the hearing of it. The people hereupon called a common counfell, in which affembly there were certaine or atours appointed, that stirred vp the common people against him: and when they had told their tales, Martins rose vp to make them answer. Now, notwithstanding the mutinous people made a maruellous great noise, yet when they saw him, for the reucrence they bare vnto his valiantnesse, they quieted themselues, and gaue him audience to alledge with leisure what he could for his purgation. Moreover, the honestest men of the ANTIATES, and who most reioyced in peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly. And judge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he didlet him speake, he would proughis innocencie to the people, because amongst other things he had an eloquent tongue; besides that the first good service he had done to the people of the Volsces, did winne him more favour, then these last acculations could purchase him displeasure; and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimony of the goodwill they ought him; for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the city of Rome, if they had not bin very neare taking of it, by meanes of his approach and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprise, neither to tary for the mutining and rising of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of the conspiracy, began to cry out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not fuffer a traitor to vsurpe tyrannicall power ouer the tribe of the Volses, who would not yeeld vp his state and authority. And in faying these words, they corisland all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to rescue in the cities. him. Howbeit it is a cleare case, that this murder was not generally consented vnto, of the most of Antium. part of the Volsces for men came out of all parts to honor his body, and did honourably bu- Coriolanus ry him; fetting vp his tombe with great store of armour and spoiles, as the tombe of a worthy person and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderstanding of his death, shewed no other honour or malice, fraing that they granted the ladies their request they made: that they might mourne tenne moneths for him, and that was the full time they yied to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, ot husbands, according to Numa Pempilius order, who stablifhed the fame, as we have enlarged more amply in the description of his life. Now Martius being morning dead, the whole state of the Volse Bs heartily wished him aliue againe. For, first of all they fell appaired out with the ALOVES who were their friends and confederates) touching preheminence and by Numa. place; and this quarrell grew on fo farre between them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was flain in the field and the flower of all their force was put to the fword: fo that they were com. fidiu flain pelled to accept most shamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themselves fubiect vnto the conquerers, and promifing to be obedient at their commandement.

THE COMPARISON OF Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus:

OW that we have written all the deedes of worthy memory, done by either of them both, we may presently discerne, that in matters of war the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardy and valiant for their persons, as also wise and politicke in the warres: vnlesse they will say, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by fea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had alwayes the victory of his enemies. For otherwise, in this they were much alike: that where they were both present and had charge and power to command, all things profpered notably, and with good fuccesse on the part they were of; and alfo when they tooke the contrary fide, they made the first haue the worst enery way. Now for matters of government, the Noblemen and honest citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man most dissolute, and given to flattery: because he ever studied by all deuice he could, to curry fauour with the common people. So did the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernement, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Notwithstanding he is lesse to be blamed that feeketh to please and gratific his common people, then he that despiseth and disdaineth them; and therefore offereth them wrong and iniury, because he would not seeme to flatter them, to winnethe more authoritic. For as it is an euill thing to flatter the common people to winne credite: euen so is it besides dishonesty, and iniustice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himselfe terrible to the people, by offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honest natured man, plaine, and simple, without art or of Alcibia. cunning: but Alcibiades meerely contrary; for he was fine, fubtill, and deceitfull. And the greatest fault they ever burdened Alcibiades for, was his malice and deceit, wherewith he abused the Ambassadors of the LACED EMONIANS, & that he was a let that peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this act he fuddenly brought the city of Athens into wars, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the Mantingans and the Argives, who by Alcibiades practife entred into league with the ATHENIANS. And Martins, as Dionyfins the historiographer writeth: did by craft and deceit bring the ROMAINES into warres against the Volsces, causing the Volsces maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to Rome to see the games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked; for it was not done for any civill diffention, nor for any icalousse and contention in matters of government as Alcibiades did: but only following his cholericke mood, that would be pleafed with nothing, as Dionfaid, he would needes trouble and turmoile the most part of ITALY, and so being angry with his country, he destroyed many other towns and cities that could not helpe it, nor do withall. This is true also, that Alcibiales spite and malice did worke great mischiefe and misery to his country: but when he faw they repented them of the iniury they had done him, he came to himselfe, and did withdraw his army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANS to run into great errors, neither would he seethem cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he forsake them in any danger they put themselues into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in old time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. For he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the army of the Athenians, although they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had further to do. Where Martius to the contrary, did first great hurt vnto the whole city of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him:yea, and when the best and chiefest part of the city were grieued for his fake, and were very fory and angry for the iniury done him. Furthermore, the Ro-MAINES fought to appease one only displeasure and despight they had done him, by many ambassades, petitions and requests they made, whereunto he neuer yeelded, untill his mother, wise, and children came, his heart was so hardened. And hereby it appeared he was entred into this cruell warre (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent vtterly to destroy and spoilehis country, and not as though he meant to recouer it, or to returne thirher again. Here was indeed the difference betweene them: that spials being laid by the LACED EMONIANS to kill Alcibiades, for the partice they did beare him, as also for that they were affraid of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to Athens. Where Martins contrariwife, having bene so honourably received & entertained by the Volses, he could not with honeffy for fake them, confidering that they had done him that honour, as to chuse him their Generall, and trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole army and power into his hands; and not as the other, whom the Lace DAMONIANS rather abused then vsed him, suffering him to go vp and downe their city (and afterwards in the midst of their campe) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiades was compelled to put himselfe into the hands of Tisaphernes: vnlessethey will say that he went thither of purposeto him, with intent to saue the city of ATHENS from vtter destruction, for the defire he had to returne home againe. Moreouer, we reade of Alcibiades, that he was a Alablades great taker, and would be corrupted with mony: and when he had it, he would most licentious-Iy and diffioneftly spendit. Where Martius in contrary maner would not so much as accept gifts land man.

Lawfully offered him by his captaines, to be now him for his vollegant of And the consolidation with the second with lawfully offered him by his captaines, to honor him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him fuch ill will, for the controuerfie they had with the Nobility about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well inough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Arifotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commend the singular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially: that he passed all other for winning mens good wils. Whereas Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affability, became hatefull, euen to those that received benefite by them, who could not abide his severity and selfe will: which causeth desolation, (as Plato faith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether for faken. Contrariwife, feeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainement, and a very good grace with him, and could fashion himselfe in all companies, it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himself much honoured and beloued of the people, considering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the commonwealth, yet they did oft make him their Generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole city. Where Martins fuing for an office of honor, that was due to him, for the fundry good feruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honored his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martins also did neuerany great exploit, being General of his country men, but when he was General of their enemies against his natural country; wheras Alcibiades, being both a prinate person, and a General did notable service vnto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades and corio. wherefoeuer he was prefent, had the vpper hand euer of his accusers, euen as he would himselfe, land the and their accusations tooke no place against him vnlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius countrie. being present, was condemned by the Romaines: and in his person murdered and slaine by fomecolour to doit, when he openly denied the Romaine ambaffadours peace, which after he privately graunted, at the request of women. So by this deed of his, he tooke not away the enmity that was betweene both people: but leaning warre still betweene them, he made the Volsces (of whom he was Generall) to lose the opportunity of noble victory. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) have withdrawne his army with their counfell and confent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their General; if he had made that account of them, as their goodwill towards him did in duty bind him. Or clfe, if he did not care for the Volsces in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue it off when his anger was blowne ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardon his country, but rather he should in pardoning his country, haue spared his mother, because his mother and wife, were members of the body of his countrey and city, which he did befiege. For in that he vncourteoufly rejected all the publike petitions, requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the bishops and priests, to gratifie only the request of his mother with his departure: that was no act fo much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his country by the which was preferued for the pity and intercession of a woman, and not for the loue of it felf, as if it had not bene worthy of it. And so was this departure a grace (to say truly very odious & cruell, and deferued no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his army, not at the request of the ROMAINES, against whom he made war: nor with their confent, at whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the austeritie of his nature, and his haughty obstinate mind, was the onely cause: the which of it selfe being hateful to the world, when it is joyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce and intollerable. For men that have that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, feeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not give them honour and reverence, they would straight take it in scorne, and little care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides and Epaminondas, all vsed this maner: not to seekethe good will of the comon people by flattery and diffimulation: which

THE LIFE OF Paulus Æmylius.

HEN I first began to write these lines, my intent was to profite other: but fince cotinuing and going on, I have much profited my felf by looking into these histories, as if I looked into a glasse, to frame and fashion my life to the mould & patterne of these vertuous noble men. For running ouer their maners in this fort, & feeking alfo to describe their lives: me thinks I am stil conver sant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to perufe their histories, and to wey the vertues and qualities they have had, and what fingularitie each of them possessed; and to chuse and cull out the chiefest things of note in them, and their best speeches and doings most worthy of memory: then I crie out:

O gods, can there be more passing pleasure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man civill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man? Democritus the Philosopher writeth, that we should pray we might ever see happic images and fignes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is evill and vnfortunate: presupposing a false opinion and doctrine in Philosophie, which allureth men to infinite superstitions: That there are good and badde images flying in the ayre, which give a good or ill impression vnto men, and incline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of ancient histories, and gathering these liues together which now I leave before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the acts of the most noble, vertuous, and best given men offormer age, & worthie memory: I do teach and prepare my selfe to shake offand banish from me all lewd and dishonest conditions, if by chance the company and conversation of them whose company I keepe, and must of necessitie haunt, do acquaint me with some vnhappie or vngracious touch. This is easie vnto me, that do dispose my mind, being quiet and not troubled with any passion, vnto the deepe cosideration of fo many noble examples. As I do present vnto you now in this volume, the lines of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus Amylius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good and an vpright mind with the, but were also fortunate & happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly judge, when you have read over their lives, whether wisdom or good fortune they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and fet at any fines, or that they banished them, or gaue them any other repulse; but they loued them as well as they didbefore, so soone as they shewed any token of repentance, and that they were sory for the wrong they had done them, and were easily made friends againe with them, after they were restored from their banishment. For he that disdaineth to make much of the people, and to have their fauour, should much more seorneto seeke to be reuenged when he is repulsed. For, to take a repulse and denyall of honour so inwardly to the heart, cometh of no other cause, but that he did too earnestly desire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not dissemble at all, that he was not very glad to fee himselfe honored, and sory to be reiected and denyed any honour:but also he sought all the meanes he could to make himselfe beloued of those amongst whom he lived. Whereas Martius floutnesse and haughty stomacke, did stay him from making much of those that might advance and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himselfe for spite and anger, when he faw he was despised. And this is all that reasonably may be reproued in him: for otherwise he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and mony, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest Coriolanus notable ab.

men of all GRECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was vindoubtedly alwaies too licentious and loofely given, and had too small regard of the duty of honestie.

brought them to atchieue to fuch honourable acts and exploits as they did. Many (and the most part of historiographers) do write, that the house and family of the AEmylians in Rome, was alwaies of the most incient of the nobility, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme also that the first of that house that gaue name to all the posterity after, was Marcus, the sonne of Pyof the AE- thagoras the wife, whom king Numa for the sweetnesse and pleasant grace of his tongue, surnamed Marcus Amyliu: and those specially affirme it, that say king Numa was Pythagoras scholler. Howfocuer it was, the most part of this family that obtained honour and estimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate also in all their doings, sauing Lucius Paulus onely, who died in the battell of CANNES. But his mistortune doth beare manifest testimony of his wisdom & valiancietogether. For he was forced to fight against his will, when he saw he could not bridle the rafhnesse of his fellow Confull that would needs joyne battell; and to do as he did, saving that he fled not as the other, who being the first procurer of the battel; was the first that ran away: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did sticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the last gaspe. This A Emylius left a daughter behind him called AEmylia, which was maried vnto Scipiothe Great: and a sonne, Paulus A Emylius, being the same man whose life we presently treate of. His youth fortunately fellout in a flourishing time of glo. rie and honour, through the fundry vertues of many great and noble persons living in those dayes, among whom he made his name famous also : and it was not by that ordinary art and courle, which the best esteemed youg men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vse to pleade private mens causes in law, neither would creepe into mens favour by fawning vpon any of them: though he faw it a common practife, and policy of men, to feeke the peoples fauour and goodwils by fuch meanes. Moreouer, he refused not that common course which other tooke, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had bene so disposed but he rather sought to winne reputation by his honesty, his valiantnesse, and vpright dealing, as choosing that the better way then either of the other two, insomuch as Failus AE in maruellous short time he passed all those that were of his age. The first office of honor he sued for, was the office of Aldylu, in which fuite he was preferred before twelue other that fued for the felf fame office: who were men of no small quality, for they all came afterwards to be Confuls. After this, he was chosen to be one of the number of the pricets, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who have the charge of all the divinations and foothfayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birds, and fignes in the aire. He was fo carefull, and took fuch pains to ynderfrand how the Romaines did vie the same, and with such diligence sought the observation of the ancient religion of Romains in all holy matters: that where that priesthood was before esteemed but a title of honor, and defired for the name only, he brought it to passe, that it was the most honorable science, and best reputed of in Rom E: wherin he confirmed the philosophers o. pinion, that religion is the knowledge how to serue God. For when he did any thing belonging to his office of priefthood, he did it with great experience, judgement, & diligence leaving all other thoughts, & without omitting any ancient ceremony, or adding to any new, contending of. tentimes with his companions, in things which feemed light, and of small moment : declaring vnto them, that though we do presume the gods are easie to be pacified, & that they readily pardon all faults and scapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more but for respect of common wealths fake, they shold not slightly nor carelesty disfeble or passe over faults comitted in those matters: for no man (faith he) at the first that committeeth any fault, doth alone trouble the state of the comon wealth; but withal, we must thinke he leaueth the grounds of civil government. that is not as careful to keepe the institutions of smal matters, as also of the great. So was he also a seuere captaine & strict observer of all martial discipline, not seeking to win the souldiers love by flattery, when he was generall in the field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a fecond charge, by shewing himself gentle and courteous in the first, vnto those that serued vnder him: but himselfe did orderly shew them the very rules and precepts of the discipline of wars, euen as a priest that shold expresse the names & ceremonies of some holy sacrifice, wherin were danger to omit any part or parcell. Howbeit, being terrible to execute the law of armes vpon rebellious and disobedient souldiers, he kept vp therby the state of the commonweale the better judging to ouercome the enemy by force, was but an accessarie as a man may terme it in respect of well training and ordering his citizens by good discipline. While the ROMAINES were in warres against king Antiochus surnamed the Great, in the South parts, all the chiefest captaines captains of Rome being employed that wayes, there fell out another in the necke of that, in the West parts towards Spaine where they were vpin armes. Thither they fent Amylius Prætor, Pauliu M. not with fixe axes as the other Prætors had borne before them, but with twelue : fo that vnder Pretor in the name of Prætor, he had the authoritie and dignity of a Confull. Moreover he took there two hundred & fifty cities, all which did open, and gladly receive him in. So, leaving fight. all that country quiet and in good peace, and having received their fealty by oath made between his hands he returned againe to Rome, not inriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tookelitle regard to his expences, he spent so frankly, neither was his purse his master though his revenue was not great to beare it out, as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had was litle enough to fatisfie his wives joynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a noble Confull Papyrins Masso, and after they had lived a long time together, he was dinorced from her, notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus. The inst cause of the divorce between them, ap- Scipio the peared not to vs in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the separation of a second and certaine mariage is true: That a certaine Romaine hauing for saken his wife, her friends fel out Maximus with him, and asked him, What fault dost thou find in here is she nothonest of her body; is she were the not faire? doth she not bring theegoodly children? But he putting forth his foot, shewed them for pause last smaller his shooe, and answered them: Is not this agoodly shooe; is not it finely made; and is it not new: yet I dare say there is neuer a one of you can tel where it wringeth me. For to say truly, great & right fifth open faults are commonly occasions to make husbands put away their wives: but yet oftetimes houshold words runne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked conditions, or of diversity of of a Ronatures, which strangers are not privy vnto) that in processe of time they do beget such a strange for looke his alteration of loue and minds in them, as one house can no longer hold them. So Emylius, ha- wife. uing put away Papyria his first wife, he maried another that brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with himselfe in his house, and gaue his two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the noblest and richest families of the city of Rome. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was five times Conful, and the yonger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the greate Scipio the African did adopt, being his cofin germaine, and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the fonne of Cato The retige maried the one, and Alius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honest man, and did more of Alius nobly maintaine himsels in his pouerty, then any other Romann Effor they were sixteen e perform all of one name, and of the house of the Alians, very necre akinne one to the other, who quietise, had all but one litle house in the city, and a smal farme in the country, wherewith they entertained themselves, and lived all together in one house, with their wives, and many little children. Amongst their wives, one of them was the daughter of Paulus Amylius, after he had beene twife Confull, and had triumphed twife, not being ashamed of her husbands poucrty, but wondring at his vertue that made him poore. Now Amylius being chosen Consult, went to make warre with the Ligyrians, AEmplius who dwelled in the ALPES, & which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valiat conful. and warlike men, and were very good fouldiers at that time, by reafon of their continuall wars against the Romains, whose neere neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth upon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foot ioyneth to the THVS CAN fea, & pointerh towards AFRICK, & are mingled with the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, neighbours vnto the sea coast:who scowring al the Mediterranian sea at that time, unto the straight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnaces of pirates, let althe traffick and entercourse of merchadize. Amylius being gone to seek the in their country, they taried his coming with an army of forty thousand men: neuerthelesse, though he hadbut eight thousand men in all, and that they were fine to one of his, yet he gaue the onfet vpon them, and ouerthrew

Then he fent to offer them peace for the Romaines would notaltogether destroy the Ligyrians because their country was as a rampier or bulwarke against the invasion of the GAVLES, who lay lurking for oportunity and occasion to invade ITA-LY: wherupon these LIGVRIANS yeelded theselves vnto him, & put all their forts & ships into his hands. Amyline deliucred vnto them their holds again, without other hurt done vnto them. fauing that he razed the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he took all their ships from them. leaving them litle botes of three owers oncly, and no greater; and fet all the prisoners at liberty they had taken, both by fea and by land, aswell Romaines as other, which were a maruellous number. These were all the notable acts he did worthy memory, in the first yeare of his Cosulthip. Afterwards he oftentimes thewed himfelfe very defirous to be Conful againe; and did put forth himselfe to sue for it; but when he was denied it, he neuer after made sute for it againe, but gaue himselfe only to study divine things, and to see his children verteously brought vp, not only in the ROMAINE tongue which himselfe was taught, but also a litle more curiously in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not onely retaine Gramarians, Rhetoritians, and Logicians, but also painters, grauers of images, riders of horses, and hunts of GRECE about his children: & he him. selfalso (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with the in the schoole when they were attheir books, & also when they otherwise did exercise themselues. For he loued his children as much or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the state of the common wealth, the Romains were at wars with king Perseus, and they much blamed the captains they had fent thither before, for that for lack of skil & courage, they had so cowardly behaued the Kemisius themselves, as their enemies laughed them to scorne and they received more hurt of them, then they did vnto the king. For not long before, they had driven king Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, and made him for fake the reft of AsIA, and had flut him vp within the borders of SYRIA. who was glad that he had bought that country with fifteene thousand talents, which he paid for a fine. A litle before also, they had ouercome Philip, king of Mackdon in The scaly, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer, having ouercome Hannibal (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the world was comparable, either for his power or valiantnesse) they thought this too great a dishonour to them, that this warre they had against king Per few, should hold so long of even hand with them, as if he had bene an enemyequall with the people of Rome: confidering also that they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered people of the ouerthrown army his father had lost before, and knew not that Philip had left his army stronger, and more expert by reason of his ouerthrow, then it was before: as I will briefly rehearle the story from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greatest power of all the captaines and successours of Alexander the Great, having obtained for himselfe and his posterity the title of a King, had a sonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the fecond, that was furnamed Gonates, whose some was also called Demetrius. that raigned no long time, but died, and left a yong fonne called Philip. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should beleft without heire, they preferred one Antigonus, cosin to the last deceassed King, & made him marry the mother of Philip the leffe, giving him the name at the first of the Kings protectour only, and lieutenant generall of his maiesty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wife Prince, and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the absolute name of a king, & surnamed him DoDoson King for, to say, the giuer for he promised much and gaue little. After him raigned Philip, who in his
of Matedan greene youth gaue more hope of himselfe, then any other of the Kings before: insomuch as they of Macedon thought that one day he would restore Mace non her ancient fame and glory, and that he alone would pluck downethe pride and power of the Romains, who role against all the world. But after that he had lost a great battell, and was ouerthrowne by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of Scorvs A, then he began to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES, thinking he escaped good cheape, for any light ransome or tribute the ROMAINES should impose vpon him. Yet afterwards coming to vnderstand himselfe, he grew to disdaine it much, thinking that to raignethrough the fauour of the Romaines, was but to make himselfe a flaue, to feek to liue in pleasure at his ease, and not for a valiant & noble prince borne. Wherupon he fet all his mind, to study the discipline of wars, & made his preparation as wisely & closely as possibly he could. For he left all his townes along the sea coast, and standing vpon any high waies, without any fortification at al & in maner desolate without people, to the end there might

his Realme farre from great beaten waies, he leauied a great number of men of warre, and replenished his towns and strong holds that lay scatteringly abroad, with armour and weapon, mony and men, prouiding for warre, which he kept as secretly as he could. For he had prouision of armour in his armory, to arme thirty thousand men, & eight million bushels of corne safely lockt Philipsarvp in his forts and ftronger places, and ready money as much as would ferue to entertaineten more. thousand strangers in pay to defend his country for the space of ten yeares. But before he could bring that to paffe he had purposed, he died for gricfe and sorrow, after he knew he had vniustly The death put Demetrius the best of his sonnes to death, upon the false accusation of the worst, that was Per . If King feus: who as he did inherite the kingdome of his father by fuccession, so did he also inherite his fathers malice against the Romaines. But he had no shoulders to beare so heavy a burden, & efpecially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many leud and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous and miserable. They say also, that he was not legitimate, because Philips wife had taken him from Gnathainia (a tailors wife borne at AR GOS) immediatly after he was borne, and did adopt the child to be hers. And some thinke that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, searing less this lawful son wold seeke occasion to proue him a bastard. Notwithstanding, simple though he was, & of vile and base nature, he found the strength of his kingdome so great, that he was contented to take vpon him to King Permake war against the Romains, which he maintained a long time, & fought against their Confuls, that were their Generals, and repulsed great armies of theirs both by sea & land, and ouer war with the Rocame some. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that invaded MACEDON, was overthrown maines, by him in a battel of horsme, where he slew at that time two thousand fine hundred good men of Fublius his, & took fix hundred prisoners. And their army by sea, riding at anker before the city of OR E - Consultor v m he did fodainly fet vpon, & took twenty great ships of burden, and all that was in them, and uerthrowne funke the rest, which were all loaden with corn; and took of all forts besides, about 54. foysts & by Persus. galliots of fifty owers apecce. The fecond Conful and General he fought withall, was Hoftilius, Hoftilius, whom he repulled, attepting by force to inuade MACEDON by way of the city of ELVMIA. A. confulrenother time again, when heentred in by stealth vpo the coast of THESSALY, he offered him bat- pulled one tel, but the other durft not abide it. And as though this war troubled him nothing at all, and that he had cared little for the ROMAINES, he went and fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he flue ten thousand of those barbarous people, and brought away a maruellous great spoile. Moreover he procured the nation of the GAVLE's dwelling vpon the river of Danuby, which they call Bastarna (men very warlike, and excellent good horsemen) & did pra- Bastarna Cife with the ILLYRIANS also by meane of their king Gentius, to make them io yne with him in the Ganler this warre: fo that there ranne a rumor, that for mony he had gotten those Gavles to come dwelling downe into ITALY, fro the high country of GAVLE all along the Adriatike fea. The ROMAINS siver of Dabeing aduertised of these newes thought the time served not now to dispose their offices in wars nutie, any more by grace and fauour vnto those that sued for them; but contrariwise, that they should

that fued for the Cofulship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for defire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of affured victory, & happy fuccesse of this begun warre : fo great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they sale her. chose him Consul again the second time. Wherfore so soone as he was chosen, they would not saketh proceed to drawing of lots according to their custome, which of the two Confuls should happe charge of togointo MACEDON: but presently with a ful and whole consent of them all, they gave him the the marres. whole charge of the warres of Macedon. > vpon king Perfeus, all the people did honourably company him home vnto his house: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her, asked her why she wept. The poore girle answered, colling him about the necke, and kiffing him: Alas father, wote you what your Perfew is dead. She meant it by a little whelp fo called, which was her play-fellow. In good houre my girle, faid he, I like the figne wel. Thus did Cicero the orator report of it in his booke of divinations. The Romaines, had a cufrome at that time, that fuch as were elected Confuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heare Amylius speak, he made this oration vnto them: that the first time he sued to be Consul, was in respect of himselfe, standing at that time inneed of such honour: now he offered himselfe the second time viito it, for the good loue he bare viito them, who food in need of a Generall, wherefore he thought himselfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke also this warre might be better followed by any other then by himselfe, he would presently with all his hartrefigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any truft or confidence in him, that they though him a man sufficient to discharge it then that they would not speake nor meddle in any matter 3) that concerned his dutie, and the office of a Generall, fauing onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to do what focuer he commanded, and should be necessary for the warre and feruice they took in hand. For if cuery man would be a commander, as they had bin hereto-5) fore, of those by whom they should be commanded then the world would more laughthem to 55 fcome in this feruice, then ever before had bin accustomed. These words made the ROMAINS very obedient to him, and perceived good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refused those ambitions flatterers that fued for the charge, and had given it vnto a man, that durst boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Marke how the Romains by yeelding vnto reaso & vertue, came to command all other, & to make themselves the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Emplius fetting forward to this warre, had wind at will, and faire passage to bring him to his journeys end, I impute it to good fortune, that fo quickly and fafely conveyed him to his campe. But for the rest of his exploits, he did in all his warre part of them being performed by his owne hardinesse, other by his wisdome and good counsell, other by the diligence of his friends in feruing him with good will, other by his owne refolute constancy and courage in extremest danger, & last, by his maruellous skil in determining at an instant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy service vnto this his good fortune they talke of so much, as they may do in other captains doings; vnlesse they wil say peraduenture, that Perfeus couetor finesse and misery was Amylius good fortune for his miserable feare of spending mony, was the only cause & destruction of the whole realme of MACEDON, which was in good ftare & hope of continuing in prosperity. For there came down into the country of MACEDON at king Perfess request, ten thousand Bastarnæ a horse-backe, & as many footmen to them, who alwaies joyned with them in batteliall mercenary fouldiers, depending upon pay and entertainment of wars, as men that could not plow, nor fow, nor trafficke marchandizes by fea, nor skill of grazing to gaine their lining with and to be short, that had no other occupation or merchandize, but to ferue in the warres, and to ouercome those with whom they fought. Furthermore, when they came to incamp and lodge in the MEDICA, neareto the MACEDONIANS, who faw them so goodly great men, and so well trained and exercised in handling all kind of weapons, so braue and lufty in words and threats against their enemies: they began to pluck vp their hearts, and to lock big, imagining that the Romains would neuer abide them, but would be afeard to look them in the face, & only to feetheir march, it was so terrible & fearefull. But Perfeus after he had incouraged his men in this fort, & had put them in fuch a hope and iollity, when this barbarous supply came to ask him a thousand crownes in hand for every captain, he was so damped & troubled withall in his mind, casting up the sum it came to, that his only couetousnes and misery made him returne them back, and refule their service not as one that meant to fight with the Ro-MAINES, but rather to spare histreasure, & to be a husband for the, as if he should have given vp a straight account vnto the of his charges in this war, against whom he made it. And not with stanfem, ward ding also his enemies did teach him what he had to do, cosidering that besides al other their warlike furniture & munitio, they had no leffe then a hundred thousand fighting men lying in camp an army & to maintaine the wars, which forced his enemies to be at extreme charge in entertaining fuch multitudes of men, more then needed; hardly would depart with his gold and filtier. but kept it safe locked up in his treasury, as if he had bene afraid to touch it, and had bin none of his. And he did not show that he came of the noble race of the kings of Lydia, & Phoenicia who gloried to be rich; but shewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged some part of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both because they esteemed to buy victory with money, not money with victory, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the world. Hereof came the common faying in old time, that it was not Philip, but his gold and filuer that won the cities of GRECE. And Alexander whe he went to conquer the INDIES, seeing the MACEDONI-AN scary with them all the wealth of Persia, which made his campe very heavy, and flow to marchihe himself first of al set fire on his own carriage that conveyed al his necessaries, &perswaded other to do the like, that they might march more lightly, and easily on the journey. But Perfew contrarily would not spend any part of his goods, to saue himselfe, his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priloner in triumph with a great ransome, to shew the ROMAINES how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely fend away the GAVLES without giving them pay as he had promised, but moreover having perswaded Gentius king of ILLY- Gentius RIA to take his part in these wars, for the sum of three hundred talents which he had promised King of the to furnish him with he caused the money to be told, and put vp in bags by those whom Gentius add perfent to receive it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himfelfe fure of the money promised, committed a fond and foule part: for he stayed the ambassadours the Romaines sent vnto him, and committed them to prison. This part being come to Perseus cares, he thought now he needed not hire him with mony to be an enemy to the Romains, confidering he had waded so farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifest figne of his ill will towards them, and that it was too late to looke backe and repent him, now that his foule part had plunged him into certain warres, for an Perfect vncertain hope. So did he abuse the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred double dear talents he had promised him. And worse then this, shortly after he suffered Lucius Ancius the ROMAIN B. Prætor, whom they fent against him with an army, to plucke King Gentius, his wife, wist. and children out of his kingdome, and to cary them prisoners with him. Now when Emylins that onerwas arrived in Macedon, to make warre against such an enemy, he made no manner of reckoning of his person, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one camp he had source Lucius A. thousand horsemen, & no lesse then forty thousand footmen, with the which army he had planted himselfe along the sea side, by the foot of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpossible to be approached: and there he had so well fortified all the straights and passages vnto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himself to lie safe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with olympus, cations of wood, that he thought numerito he rate out of an unuger, and amount of the meane feaf on lay not with charge. Amylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. Amylius in the meane feaf on lay not with 4000 horizontal to put formething in horizontal to put formething in idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no meanes vnartempted, to put something in and 40000 proofe. And perceiuing that his fouldiers by ouer much licentious liberty (wherin by fufferance footmen. they lived before) were angry with delaying and lying still, and that they did busily occupy themselues in the Generals office saying this, and such a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commanded them they should meddle no more too curiously #molim in matters that pertained notto them, and that they should take care for nothing else, but to see their commences the second sec their armour and weapon ready to fer the valiantly, and to vietheir fwords after the Romains dien. fashion, when their Generall should appoint and command them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to look to themselues, he commanded those that watched, should have no speares Paulus IEnor pikes, because they should be more wakefull, having no long weapon to refiss the enemy, if mylins they were affaulted. The greatest trouble his army had, was lack of fresh water, because the water the wat ter that ranto the fea, was very litle, & maruellous foule by the fea fide. But Amylius coffdering to have no they were at the foot of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood freares mer withal) coiectured, feeing the trees fo fresh & green, that there shold be some little prety springs among them, which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes & wels along the moutain, which were straight filled with faire water, being pent within groud before for lack of The oriesbreaking open the heads, which the randown in streames, & meet together in fundry places. And mall of yet some do deny, that there is any meeting of waters within the ground, fro whence the springs frings. do come and they fay that running out of the earth as they do it is not for that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time:

but that it ingendreth & rifeth at the same time and place where it runneth not, turning the subflance into water, which is a moift vapour, thickned & made cold by the coldnesse of the earth, and so becometh a streame and runneth downe. For (fay they) as womens breasts are not alwaies full of milk (as milk pans are that continually keep milk) but do of themselues couert the nutriment women take into milke, and after cometh forth at their nipples: euen so the springs and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, have no meetings of lifeden waters, nor hollow places fo capable readily to deliuer water from the, as one wold draw it out of a pumpe or cifterne from fo many brooks, and deep rivers; but by their natural coldnes and moisture, they waxe thick, and put forth the vapour and aire so strong, that they turne it into water. And this is the reaso why the places where they dig & open the earth, do put forth more abudance of water by opening the ground: like as wontens breafts do give more milk when they are most drawne and suckt, because in a fort they do better feed the vapour within them, & conuert it thereby into a running humour. Where to the contrary, those parts of the earth that are not digged, nor have no vent outward, are the more vnable, & leffe meete to ingender water hauing not that prouocation and course to runne, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture. Yet fuch as maintain this opinion, do give them occasion that love argument, to contrary them thus: Then we may fay by like reasonalso, that in the bodies of beasts there is no bloud long before, and that it in endreth upon a fodgine, when they are hurt, by transferring of fome fpirit or flesh that readily changeth into some running liquor. And moreouer, they are confuted by the common experiece of these mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettal or that vidermine castles to win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meet in the bowels of the earth with running rivers, the water whereof is not ingendred by litle & litle as of necessity it should be, if it were true, that vpon the prefent opening of the ground, the humour should immediatly be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes that in cutting thorough a mountaine or rocke, fodainely there runneth out a great quantitie of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to return to our history again. Amyline lay there a convenient time, and stirred not and it is said there were neuer scentwo so great armies one so necre to the other. and to be so quiet. In the end, casting many things with himself, and deuising fundry practises, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the country of PERRÆBIA ouer against the temple called Pythion, and the rock vpo which it is built, where there lay no garrison: which gaue him better hope to passe that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrownes and hardnes of the way vnto it. So, he brake the matter of his councel. Thereup of Scipio Na. Scipio called Nasca (the son adopted of that Great Scipio the Afra 1 CAN, who became afterwards a great man, and was prefident of the Senate or councell) was the first man that offered himselfe to leade them, whom it would please him to send to take that passage, & to assault their enemies behind. The second was Fabius Maximus, the eldest son of Amylius, who being but a very yong man, rose notwithstanding, and offered himselfe very willingly. Amylius was very glad of their offers, and gauethem not so many men as Polybius writeth, but so many as Nasica himself declareth in a letter of his he wrot to a king, where he reportethal the story of this journy. There were 3000 ITALIANS, leauied in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMAINES, who were not of the ROMAINE legions, and in the left wing about 5000. Besides those, Wasica tooke also 120. men at armes, and about 200. CRETANS and THRACIANS mingled together, of those Harpalus had sent thither. With this number Nasica departed from the campe, and tooke his way toward the fea fide, and lodged by the temple of Hercules, as if he had determined to do this feate by fea, to enuiron the campe of the enemies behind. But when the fouldiers had supped, & that it was darke night, hemade the captaines of enery band priny to his enterprise, and so marched all night a contrary way from the sea, vntil at the length they came vnder the temple of Pythion, where he lodged to rest the souldiers that were sore travelled all night. In this place, the mount The hight Olympus is about ten furlongs high as appeared in a place ingrauen by him that measured it.

Yet the Geometricians fay that there is no mountaine higher, nor fea deeper, then the length of ten furlongs: fo that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his measure at aduenture, and by gesse, but by true rules of the art and instruments Geometricall. There Nasica re-Aed all night. King Perseus perceiving in the meane time that Amylius stirred not from the place where he lay, mistrusting nothing his practise, and the coming of Nasica, who was at hand, vntill such time as a traytor of CRETE (stealing from Nasica) did reueale vnto him the pretended practife, as alfo the ROMAINE's compassing of him about: he wondered much at these newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he lay in, but dispatched one of his captaines called Milon, with ten thousand strangers, and two thousand MACEDONIANS: and straightly commanded him with all the possible speed he could, to get the top of the hill before them. Polybius faith, that the ROMAINE'S came and gaue them an alarum, when they were fleeping: But Nasica writeth, that there was a maruellous sharpe and terrible battell on the top of the mountaine: and faid plainely, that a Thracian souldier coming towards him, hethrew his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breft, flew him starke deade; and having repulsed their enemies, Milon their captain shamefully running away in his coat without armor or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safety of all his company. Westerwest This conflict fortuning thus, Perfeus raised his campe in great haste from the place where he was, of Macedon & being disappointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits end, & not knowing how to determine. Yet was he constrained either to stay, & incampe before the city of Pydne, there to take the hazard of battel, or else to deuide his army into his cities and strong holds, and to receive the wars within his own country, the which being once crept in, could never be driuen out againe, without great murder and bloudshed. Hereupon his friends did counsell him, to chuse rather the fortune of battell: alleadging vnto him, that he was the stronger in men a great way, & that the MACEDONIANS wold fight luftily with all the courage they could, confidering that they fought for the fafety of their wives & children, and also in the presence of their king, who should both see every mans doing, and fight himselfe in personalso for them. The king moued by these perswasions, determined to venture the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe pitched his and viewed the fituation of the places all about, & deuided the copanies amongst his captaines, earp; he purposing to giue a hot charge vpon the enemies when they should draw necre. The place and fore the civil country was such, as being al chapion, there was a goodly valley to range a battel of footmen in, and litle prety hils also one depending vpo another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, & fuch as were lightly armed to retire themselues being diffressed, & also to enuiron their enemies behind. There were two small rivers also, A fon and Lencus that ran through the fame, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of Sommer, yet of Elon & they would annoy the Romains notwithstanding. Now when Amylius was loyned with Na. Lewen. sca, he marched on straight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiuing afar off their battel marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same the wondred to behold it, and suddenly stayed his army, considering with himselfe what he had to do. Then the yong captains having charge vnder him, defirous to fight it out presently went vnto him to pray him to give the onfet, but Nafica specially aboue the rest, having good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Emylius smiling, answered him: So would I do, if I were Emylius as yong as thou. But the fundry victories I have wonne heretofore, having taught me by experience the faults the vanquished do commit, do forbid me to go so hotly to worke (before my fits, forgifouldiers have rested, which did returne but now) to assault an army set in such order of bat-ung sharge rell. When he had answered him thus, he commanded the first bands that were now in view possible. of the enemies, should embattell themselues, shewing a countenance to the enemie as though they would fight: and that those in the rereward should lodge in the meanerime, and fortific for sign of the world fight: the campe. So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by changing from man to man, take before the enemies were aware of it; he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noyse, and the enemies neuer perceiuing it. But when night came, and euery man had supped, as they were going to sleepe and take their rest: the Moone which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to change into many forts of colours, loofing her light, vntill such time as she vanished away, and was eclipfed altogether. Then the ROMAINES began to make a noise with basons and pans, as their fashion is to do in such a chance, thinking by this found to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, lifting vp many torches lighted and firebrands into the aire. The Mac E-DONIANS on the other fide did no fuch matter within the campe, but were altogether ftriken with an horrible feare: and there ranne a whispering rumour through the people, that this figne in the element fignified the eclipse of the King. For Amylius was not ignorant of the diuerfities of the eclipfes, and he had heard fay the caufe is, by reason that the Moone making her ordinarie course about the world (after certaine revolutions of time) doth come to enter into the round shadow of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden, vntill such time as hauing past the darke region of the shadow, she commeth afterwards to reconer her light which she taketh of the Sunne. Neuerthelesse, he being a godly deuout man, so soone as he perceiued the Moone had recouered her former brightnesse againe, he facrificed eleuen calues. And the next morning also by the breake of day, making facrifice to Hercules, he could neuer have any fignes or tokens that promifed him good luck, in facrificing twenty oxen one after another; but at the one& twentieth he had fignes that promifed him victory, so he defended himself. Wherfore, after he had vowed a folemne facrifice of an hundred oxen to Herenles, and also games of prices at the weapons, he commanded his captaines to put their men in readinesse to fight: and fo fought to win time, tarying till the Sunne came about in the afternoone towards the West, to the end that the Romaines which were turned towards the East, should not have it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed himselse in his tent, which was all open behind towards the fide that looked into the valley, where the campe of his enemics lay. When it grew towards night, to make the enemies fet vpon his men, some say he vsed this policy. He made a horse be driven towards them without a bridle, & certain Romains followed him, as they would have taken him againe: and this was the caufe of procuring the skirmish. Other fay, that the THRACIANS scruing vnder the charge of captaine Alexander, did set vpon certaine forragers of the ROMAINS, that brought forrage into the campe:out of the which, seuen hundred of the Ligraians ranne fuddenly to the refeue and reliefe coming fill from both armies, at the last the maine battel followed after. Wherfore Amylius like a wife General forefeeing by the danger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both campes, what the fury of the battell would come to: came out of histent, and paffing by the bands did encourage them, and prayed them to flicke to it like men. In the meane time, Nafica thrusting himselfe into the place where the skirmish was hottest, perceived the army of the enemies marching in battell ready to ioyne. The first that marched in the voward were the Thracians, who seemed terrible to look vpon, as he writeth himself: for they were mighty made men, & caried maruellous bright targets of steele before them, their legges were armed with greaues, & their thighes with takes, their coates were black, and marched shaking heavy halberds vpon their shouldiers. Next vnto these THRACIANS, there followed them all the other strangers and souldiers whom the king had hired, diverfly armed and fer forth: for they were people of fundry nations gathered together, among whom the PEONIANS were mingled. The third fquadron was of MACEDONI-Ans, and all of the chosen men, aswell for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantnes of their persons: & they were all ingoodly gilt armours, & braue purple cassockes vponthe, spicke and span new. And at their backes came after them, the old bands to shew themselues out of the campe with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the brightness of their steele and copper. And all the hils and mountaines thereabouts did ring againe like an Echo, with the cry and noise of so many fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marched so fiercely with fo great heart-burning, and fuch swiftnesse: that the first which were slaine at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs from the camp of the Romains. The charge being given and the battel begunne, Amylius gallopping to the voward of the battel, perceived that the captains Detroit of the Macedonians which were in the first ranks, had already thrust their pikes into the Ro-Amplies. MAINES targets, so as they could not come neere them with their swords; and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behind them, had now plucked them before them, and did base their pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the Ro-MAINES. of targets was, one iouning so necreanother, and what a terrrour it was to see a front of a battell with so many armed pikes and steele heads: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any fight he euer faw before, neuertheles he could wifely diffemble it at that time. And fo paffing by the companies of his horsemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he shewed a noble cheereful countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrary fide, Perfits the king of Perfits go MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, so soone as the battell was begun, withdrew himselfe, and got the battell into the city of PYDNE, vnder pretence to go to do facrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept rows Eldne. the faint sacrifice of cowards, neither doth receive their prayers, because they be vnreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not should hit the white: nor that he should winne the victory, that bideth not the battell, neither that he should have any good, that doth nothing towards it: nor that a naughty man should be fortunate and prosper. The gods did fauour Amywoney lalius prayers, because he prayed for victory with his sword in his hand, and fighting did call to have them for aide. Howbeit there is one Posidonius a writer, who saith he was in that time, and moreouer that he was at the battell: and he hath written an history containing many bookes of the acts of king Perfeus, where he faith, that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to facrifice vnto Hercules, that Perfess went from the battel, but because he had a stripe of an horse on the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well helpe himselfe, and that all his friends fought to perswade him not to go to the battell, yet he caused one of his horses to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly vied to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwne at him fro both fides. And among those, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him somewhat, but it was ouerthwart, & not with the point, and did hit him on the left fide glancing wife, with fuch a force, that it rent his coat, and rased his skin vnderneath, so as it left a marke behind a long time after. And this is all that Polidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The Romains having their hands full, and being staiced by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breach into them, there was a captaine of the Pelignian's called Salius, who tookethe enfigne Salius 4 of his band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians set upon captains of of his band, and call it among the prease or his enemies. I not affect the first among the prease of his band, and call it among the prease or his enemies. I not affect the first among the prease of his band, and call it among the prease or his pelignant of the prease them, with a martichous force and the property of them and dishonour for fouldiers to lose or forsake their ensigne. Thus was there maruellous them some force of both fides vsed in that place; for the Pelignians proued to cutthe Macedonians and three pikes with their fwords, or else to make them give backe with their great targets, or to make a thremmies. breach into the, and to take their pikes with their hands. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrary, holding their pikes fast with both hands, ran the through that came necre vnto them, so that neither target not corflet could hold out the force and violence of the push of their pikes, in so much as they turned up the heeles of the PBLIGNIANS and THRACIANS, who like desperate beafts without reason, shutting in themselues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deaths, and their first ranke were slaine enery man of them. Thereupon those that were behinde, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backs, and only retired giving backe towards the mountaine Olocrus. Emylius feeing that (as Posidonius writeth) rent his arming coate from his backe for anger, because that some of his mengaue backe: other durst not from the battell of the MACEDONIANS, which was so strongly imbattelled on enery side and so mured in with a wall of pikes, prefenting their armed heads on enery fide a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not so much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithstanding, because the field was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the front, could not alwayes keepe that wall, continuing their targets close one to another, but they were driven of necessity to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the fouldiers: that in one place they thrust forward, and in another they give backe, and leave a hole. Wherefore Amylius suddenly taking the vantage of this occafion, deuided his men into small companies, and commanded them they should quickly thrust in betweene their enemies, and occupy the places they saw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they should set on them in that fort, and not with one whole continuall charge, but occupying them here and there with diverse companies in fundry places. AEmylius gave this charge vnto the private captaines of every band and their lieuetenants, and the captaines also gaue the like charge vnto their fouldiers that could skilfully execute their commandement. For they went presently into those parts where they saw the places open, and being once

entred in among them, some gaue charge vpon the flanckes of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and vnarmed: other set vponthem behind, so that the strength of all the corpes of the battell (which confifteth in keeping close together) being opened in this fort, was straight ouerthrowne. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few against a few, the MACEDONIANS with their litle short swords, came to strike vpon the great shields of the Ro-MAINES, which were very strong, and coucred all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrary, were driven of necessity to receive the blowes of the strong heavy swords of the ROMAINES, vpontheir light weake targets, fo that what with their heauinesse, and vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corflet, but they passed it through, and ran them in. By reason whereof they could make no long resistance, whereupon they turned their backs and ranne away. But when they came to the fquadron of the old beaten fouldiers of the Macedonians, there was the crucilest fight and most desperate service, where they fay that Marcus Cato (fon of great Cato, and fon in law of Amylius) shewing all the valiantnes in his person that a noble mind could possibly persorme, lost his sword which fell out of his hand. But he like a yong man of noble courage, that had bin valiantly brought vp in all discipline, & knew how to follow the steps of his father (the poblest person that euer mansaw) was to Thew then his valure and worthines, and thought it more honor for him there to die, then liuing to suffer his enemies to enjoy any spoile of his. So, by and by he ran into the ROMAINE army, to find out some of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to help him to recouer his fword; whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lufty valiant fouldiers together, they rushed straight among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so did set vpon them with such force and fury, that they made a lane through the middest of them, and with great flaughter and spilling of bloud, euen by plaine force, they cleared the way still before them. Now when the place was voided, they sought for the sword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongsta heape of other swords and dead bodies; whereat they reioyced maruelloufly. Then finging a fong of victory, they went again more fiercely then before to giue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not yet broken afunder: vntill such time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACEDONIAN's fighting valiantly even to the last man, and neuer forfaking their rankes, were all flaine in the place. After whose ouerthrow, there was a great flaughter of other also that fled, so that all the valley and soote of the mountaines therea. bouts was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the Romaines did passe ouer the river Leucus, they found it running all bloudy. For it is said there were slaine at this field of Perfeus men, aboue five and twenty thousand: and of the ROMAINES fide, as Posidonius saith, not aboue sixescore, or as Nasica writeth, but sourescore only. And for so great an ouerthrow, it is reported it was wonderful quickly done, & executed. For they beganto fight about three of the clocke in the afternoone, and had wonne the victory before foure, and all the rest of the day they followed their enemies in chase, an hundred and twenty surlongs from the place where the battell was fought, so that it was very late, and farre forth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So fuch as returned, was received with maruellous great ioy of their pages that went out with linkes and torches lighted, to bring their masters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes & garlands of laurell, fauing the Generals tent onely: who was very heavy, for that of his two fonnes he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued best of the twaine, because he saw he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For euen then, being new crept out of the shell as it were, he was maruellous valiant and hardie, and defired honour wonderfully. Now Amylius thought he had bene cast away, fearing lest for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the raffinesse of his youth, he had put himselfe too farre in fight amongst the prease of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard straight what sorow Æmylius was in, and how grieuously he tooke it. The Romain's being set at supper, rose from their meat, and with torch-light some ran to Amylius tent, other went out of the campe to seeke him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: fo all the campe was ful of forow & mourning, the valleys and hils all about did ring againe with the cries of those that called Scipio aloud. For even from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him, of all the rare and fingular parts required in a captaine and wise gouernour of the common-weale, aboue all the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his coming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the cnemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a fwift running greyhound fleshed with the bloud of the hare) having pursued very farre for ioy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the cities of CARTHAGE and NVMANPIVM, who was the greatest man of war and valiantest captaine of the ROMAINS in his time, and of the greatest authority & reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her spite, which she did beare to so noble an exploit suffered Amylius for that time to take his full pleasure of that noble victory. And as for Perseus, he fled first fro Perseus fled the city of Py DNE, vnto the city of Pella, with his horsemen, which were in manner all saued. from "Idne When you have footmen that saued themselves by Sving meeting them by the year called them." Pella. Wherupon the footmen that faued themselues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traytors, cowards, & villaines; and worse then that, they turned them off their horse backes, and fought it out lustily with them. Perfeus seeing that, and fearing lest this mutiny might turne to light on his necke, he turned his horse out of the high way, and pulled off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe in his hand, fearing to be knowne thereby; and that he might the more easily speake with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, & led his horse in his hand. But fuch as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latchet of his shoo, another seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drink: so that one dragging after another in this fort, they al left him at the last, & ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury fo much, as their kings cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, fought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpon all other but himself. Now he being come into the city of Pella by night, Entsus & Eudens, two of his treasurers came vnto him, &speaking boldly (but out of time) prefumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and to counfell him what he should do. duty to be The king was fo moued with their prefumption, that with his own hands he stabbed his dagger observed The king was 10 moued with their prelumption, that with his own hands he has been in them both, & flew them outright. But after this fact, all his feruants & friends refuled him, and Prince. there only taried with him but Enander CR BTAN, Archedamus Atolian, & Neo Bobotian. Death, the And as for the meane fouldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, & yet it indignation was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and filter, as Bees that Printe. keepe their hines for loue of the hony: for he caried with him a great treasure, & gaue the leaue The cone to spoile certain plate & vessel of gold and filuer, to the value of fifty talents. But first of all when the creasure he was come into the city of AMPHIPOLIS, & afterwards into the city of ALEPSE, & that the feare was well blowne ouer, he returned againe to his old humour which was borne and bred with him, and that was anarice and misery: for he complained vnto those that were about him, Miles that he had vnwares given to the fouldiers of CRETA, his plate and veffell of gold to be spoiled, whine for being those which in old time belonged vnto Alexander the great; and prayed them with teares in his eies that had the place, they wold be contented to change it for ready mony. Now fuch as knew his nature, found straight this was but a fraud & a CRETAN lye, to deceive the CRETANS with:but those that trusted him, and did restore againe the plate they had, did lose it enery iot, for he neuer payed the peny for it. So he got of his friends, the value of thirty talents, which his enemics soone after did take from him. And with that sum he went into the Ile of Samothra-CIA, where he took the fanctuary and priviledge of the temple of Caftor & Pollux. They fay, that the Macedonians of long continuancedid naturally lone their kings: but then feeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed the, & broke withall. For they all came & fub- The Massmitted themselues to Amylius, and made him Lord of the whole Realme of MACEDON in two doulans dayes: and this doth feeme to confirme their words, who impute all Amylius doings vnto his themselves good fortune. And furely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in yeity Amphipolist, doth to Empliate confirme it much, which a man cannot ascribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to do facrifice, lightning fell from heaven, and fet all the wood on fire worden. vpon the altar, & fanctified the facrifice. But yet the miracle of his fame is more to be wondred at. For foure daics after Perfeus had loft the battell, and that the city of PELLA was taken, as the brought to people of Rome were at the lists or shew place, seeing horses run for games: suddenly there a. Romeout rose a rumor at the entring into the lists where the games were, that Amylius had wonne a of Macedon in source harmely a Christian and the lists where the games were, that Amylius had wonne a fin foure great battell of King Perfeus, and had conquered all MACEDON. This newes was rife straight dayer, of in cuery mans mouth, and there followed vpon it a maruellous ioy and great cheere in every corner, with shouts & clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the city of Rome. Afterwards they made diligent enquiry, how this rumour first came vp, but no certaine author no man could be knowne, and enery man faid they heard it spoken: so as in the end it came to nothing, the came is

and passed away in that fort for a time. But shortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more then before, from whence the messenger came that reported the first newes of it, which could be deuised by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwards. We do reade also of a battell that was fought in ITALY, neare vnto the river of SAGRA, whereof newes was brought the very fame day vnto Peloponnesvs. And of another also in like maner that was fought in Asia against the MEDES, before the city of MYCALA: the newes whereof came the same day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the city of Plato Es. And in that great journy where the Romains ouerthrew the Tarquins, & the army of the Latins: immediatly after the battell was wonne, they faw two goodly you men come newly from the campe, who brought newes of the victory to Rome, and they judged they were Caftor & Pollax. The first man that spake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where they watered their horse being all of a white some, told them, that he wondered how they could so quickly bring these newes. And they laughing came to him, & tooke him softly by the beard with both their hands, and euen in the market place his haire being black before, was presently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeue the report the man made, who euer after was called Anobarbus, as you would say, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like matter that happened in our time makethall such newes credible: For when Antonius rebelled against the Emperour Domitian, the city of Rome was in a maruellous perplexity, because they looked for great warres towards GERMANIE, But in this feare, there grew a sudden rumor of victory, & it went currantly through Rome, that Antonius himselfe was slaine, and all his army ouerthrowne, and not a man left alive. This rumour was so rife, that many of the chiefest men of Rome beleeued it, & did sacriffle thereupon vnto the gods, giving them thankes for the victory. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the first author of the rumour, no man could tell: for one put it ouer still to another, and it died so in the end amongst the people, as in a bottomlesse matter, for they could neuer boult out any certaine ground of it but eue as it came flying into Rome, so went it flying away againe, no man could tell how. Notwithstanding, Domitian holding on his journy to make this warre, met with posts that brought him letters of the certaine victory; and remembring the rumor of the victory that ran before in Rome, he found it true, that it was on the very same day the victory was gotten; and the distance between Rome and the place where the field was won, was aboue 20000 furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But again to our cnottani history. Cn.Octanius, lieutenant of the army of Amylius by sea, came to anker under the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where he wold not take Perfeus by force out of the fanctuary where he was for us usere. the reverence he did beare unto the gods Castor & Pollux: but he did besiege him in such fort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Iland. Yet he had secretly practised with one oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prife with him for a fum of mony to conuey him away by night: But the CRETAN ferued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken aboard by night into his veffel, all the kings treasure of gold & filuer, he sent him word that he should not faile the next night following to come into the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and feruants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping; but the next The mige night following he hoifed faile, and got him away. It was a pitifull thing that Perfeus was driven rable flato to do and fuffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle straight window vponthe wals, and not only himselfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnesse meant. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter sigh, when one told him on the peere, that he saw Oroandes the CRETAN vnder saile in the maine seas. Then day beginning to breake, & seeing himself void of all hope, heran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the fanctuary againe, before the ROMAINS that faw him could ouertake him. Andas for his children, he had given them himself into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruelloufly loued, & who did then traiteroufly betray him for he delivered his children vnto the ROMAINS. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will follow her litle ones being taken frő her) to yeeld himfelf into their hands that had his children. Now he had a speciall confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to. yeeld himself:but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and miserable fortune every way. And in the end, considering how necessity enforced him, he yeelded himselfe into the hands of Cneus Octavius, wherein he shewed plainly that he had another vice in him more vinmanly and vile, then auarice, that was, a faint heart, and feare to die. But

hereby he deprined himselfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny & take from the afflicted, and specially from them that have anoble heart. For he made request they would bring him vnto the General Amylius who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great king, by fortune of warre and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary yourselve and shamefully haboured him Gife Took State Sta lamentable state. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued himselfe. For he fell basings downe at his feet, and embraced his knees, and vitered fuch vincomely speech and vile requests, 2nto as Aimylius selfc could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being hartily offended, he spake thus vnto him: Alas poore man, why dost thou discharge fortune of this station yn. fault, where thou mightest instly charge and accuse her of thy discharge, doing things, for the results. which enery one judgeth thou hast deserved thy present misery, and art vnworthy also of thy former honor. Why dost thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing ,, thy self so base a man, as my honour is not great to ouercome so vnworthy an enemy? The Ro- 33 MAINES haue cuer esteemed magnanimity, euen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlinesse, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of every body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the custody of Alius Tubero. Then Amylius went into his tent; and caried his fons, and fons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the yonger fort. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with himselfe, not speaking a word insomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the vnconstancy of these worldly things, and faid vnto the Is there any man lining my friends, who begins for the enter into the Is there any man lining my friends, who begins for the enter into the Is there any man lining my friends, who begins for the enter into the Islands. and faid vnto the Is there any man liuing, my friends, who having fortune at will, should therefore boast & glory in the prosperity of his doings, for that he had conquered a country, city, or Realme; and not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune who laying before our eyes, and all her wing those that professe armes at this present, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainely teach vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For ", when is it, that men may thinke themselves affured, considering that when they have ouercome others, then are they driven to miltrust fortune most, and to mingle feare and mistrust, with ioy of victory: if they will wifely confider the common course of satall destiny that altereth daily, fometime fauouring one, otherwile throwing downe another? You fee, that in an houres space we haue troden vnder our feer the house of Alexander the Great: who hath bin the mightiest and most redoubted prince of the world. You see a king, that not long since was followed & accompaned, with many thousand souldiers of horsemen & sootmen, brought at this present into such " miscrable extremity, that he is inforced to receive his meate and drinke daily at the hands of his " enemies. Should we have any better hope then, that fortune wil alwaies fautor our doings, more then she doth his now, at this present no out of doubt. Therefore digesting this matter wel, you ", yong men I say, be not too brag nor foolish proud of this conquest and noble victory: but think what may happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turne the enuy of this our present " prosperity. Such were Amylius words to these yong men, as it is reported, bridling by these and fuch like perswasions, the lusty brauery of this youth, euen as with the bit and bridle of reason. Afterwards he put his army into garrifons to refresh them: and went himselfe in person in the meane time to visite Grece, making it an honorable progresse, and also a commendable. For as honorable he passed through the cities, he relieued the people, reformed the gouernment of their state, and progression euer gaue them some gift or present. Vnto some he gaue corne, which king Perseus hadgathered Greek for the wars and vnto other he gaue oiles, meeting with so great store of pronision, that he rather lacked people to giue it vnto, to receiue it at his hands, then wanting to giue, there was so much. As he passed by the city of Delenes, he saw there a great piller, four square, of white stone, which they had set up, to put king Perseus image of gold vpon it. Whereupon he commanded them to fet vp his in that place, faying: It was reason the conquered should give place vnto the conquerors. And being in the city of OLYMPIA, visiting the temple of Iupiter Olympian, he spake this openly, which enerfince hath beneremembred: that Phidias had rightly made Inpiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the ten ambassadors were arrived that were sent from Rome to establish with him the realm of Macedon, he redeliuered the Macedonians their Amyling country and townes againe, to line at liberty, according to their lawes, paying yearly to the Ro- sauch Ma-MAINS for tribute; a hundred talents: where before they were wont to pay vnto their kingsten sides as much Andhe made playes and some of all force & did not be produced by the second some of all force & did not be produced by the second some of all force & did not be produced by the second some of all force & did not be produced by the second some of th times as much. And he made playes and games of all forts, & did celebrate sumptuous sacrifices vnto the gods. He kept open court to all comers, and made noble feafts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the treasure Perseus had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and forefight, there was a speciall good ordertaken, enery man so courteously receiued and welcomed, and so orderly marshalled at the table according to their estate and calling, that the GRECIANS wondred to see him so carefull in matters of sport and pleasure: and that he tookas great paines in his own person, to see that smal matters should be ordered as they ought, as he tooke regard for discharge of more weightic causes. But this was a maruellous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous fights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons inuited, no fight nor stately shew did so delight the, as to enioy the fight and company of his person. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence & care in these matters: that to order a feast well, required as great judgement and discretion, as to set a battel: to make the one seareful to the enemics, and the other acceptable to his friends. But menesteemed his bounty & magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not only refuse to see the kings wonderfull treasure of gold and filuer, but caused it to be told, and delivered to the custody of the treasures, to cary to the coffers of store in Rome and onely suffered his sons that were learned, to take the books of the kings library. When he did reward the foldiers for their valiant service in this battel, he gaue his foninlaw Alius Tubero a cup, weying fluctalents. It is the fame Tubero we told you of before, who lived with fixteene other of his kin al in one house, and of the only revenue they had of a litle farme in the country. Some fay, that that cup was the first peece of plate that ever came into the house of the Allyans: & yet it came for honor and reward of vertue: but before that time. neither thefelues, nor their wives, would ever have, or weare any gold or filuer. After he had very well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he tooke leaue of the GRECIANS, and counfelled the Macedonians to remember the liberty the Romains had given the, & that they should be carefull to keepe it, by their good government and concord together. Then he departed from them, and took his journy towards the country of Epinys, having received commiffion from the Senate of Rome, to suffer his souldiers who had done service in the battel, and ouerthrow of king Perseus, to spoile all the cities of that country. Wherfore that he might surprise them on a fudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should fend him by a certain day, ten of the chiefest men of enery city. Who when they were come, he commanded them to go and bring him by such a day, all the gold & filuer they had within their cities, as well in their private houses, as in their temples and churches, and gaue vnto every one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had bene only to have received and searched for the gold and filuer he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the fouldiers in diverse places (and all at one time) fet vpon their enemies, and did rifle and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ransome enery man: So as by this policy, they were taken & made flaues in one day, a hundred and fifty thousand persons, and threescore & ten cities spoiled and facked enery one, And yet when they came to divide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the poll, it came not to cuery fouldiers part, about eleuen filuer Drachmes apeece. Which made enery one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terror of the wars to see the wealth and riches of fo great a Realme, to mount to so little for every mans share. When Æmylius had done this fact against his own nature, which was very gentle and courteous, he went vnto the sea side to the city of ORICA, and there embarked with his army bound for ITALIE. Where when he was arrived, he went vp the river of Tyber against the streame, in king Perseus chiefe galley, which had fixteene owers on a fide, richly fet out with the armor of the prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other fuch spoiles of the enemies: so that the Romains running out of Rome in multitudes of people to fee his galley, & going fide by fide by heras they rowed foftly, Amylius took as great pleasure in it, as in any open games or feasts, or triumph that had bin shewed indeed, But when the fouldiers faw, that the gold and siluer of king Perseus treafore was not divided amongst them according vnto promise, & that they had a great deale lesse then they looked for they were maruelloufly offended, and inwardly grudged Amylius in their hearts. Neuertheleffe they durft not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too ftraight vnto them in this war:and therefore they did shew no great desire, nor forwardnesse, to The any of procure him the honour of triumph. Which Servius Galba vnderstanding, that had benean old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men vnder him in this warreshe like an enuious viper told the people, that Amylins had not deserved the honor of triumph, and fowed feditious words against him among the foldiers, to aggravate their il wil the more against him. Moreover he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to have respit to bring forth such matter as they determined to object against him: saying the time then was far spent, the Sun being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leifure. The tribunes made him answer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his dispraise, ful of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing oration. Afterwards when night came on, the Tribunes brake vp the affembly, and the next morning the fouldiers being incouraged by Contention Galbaes oration, and having confedered together, did flock about Galba, in the mount of the Ca- about A. pitoll, where the Tribunes had given warning they would keepe their affembly. Now being mylias sit-broad day. At myliastriumph was referred to the most number of visions of the most large of the most large. broad day Amylius triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, & the first tribe flatly did deny his triumph. The Senate, & the refidue of the people hearing that, were very fory to see they did Amylius so open wrong and iniury. The common people said nothing to it, but seemed to be very fory, howbeit they sought no redresse. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and faid, it was too much shame; and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of those fouldiers, who wold grow in the end to such tumult & disorder, that they would commit all mischiefe and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to and preuented, seeing they did so openly stand against their Generall, seeking to deprine him of the honor of his triumph and victory. So they affembled a good company of them together, and went vpto the Capitol, and prayed the Tribunes they would ftay to take the voices of the people, vntill they had acquainted them with fuch needfull matter, as they had to open vnto them. The sentilly o-Tribunes granted to it, & filence was made. Then Marcus Seruilius, who had bene Confull, and ration for the farther bad founds when and any comban of life and death is his granter for the delivery of the farther than the farthe had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his owne person, & had alwaies staine rance of as many of his enemies as chalenged him man for man; rose vp, and spake in fauour of Amyliu in Emyliu in this matter: I know now (faid he) better then before, how noble and worthy a captaine Paulus et Æmylius is, who hath atcheiued fuch glory & honorable victory, with fo dishonorable & disobedient fouldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long fince reioyced and made great account of the victories and triumphs won vpon the ILLYRIANS & other nations of Africk: 66 and that now they should for spite enuy his glory (doing what lyeth in them to hinder) to bring a Macedonian king aliue in a triumph, and to shew the glory and greatnesse of king Philipand Alexander the Great, subdued by the Romain's force and power. What reason have ye, that not Iong fince, vpon a flying rumour that Amylius had won the battell against Perseus, you straight made facrifice to the gods with greatioy, praying them that you might be witneffes, of the truth thereof: and now that the person himselfe whom ye made Generall is returned home, and doth deliuer you most assured victory, you do frustratethe godsmost solemne thanks and honor due to them, and do depriue your selues also of your wonted glory in such a case: as if you were a- cc feard to see the greatnesse of your prosperity, or that you meant to pard on a king, your slaue and prisoner. And yet of the two, you have more reason to hinder the triumph, as pitying the king, then enuying your Captaine. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is growne to fuch an insolent audacity, & boldnesse, that we see men present here before vs, which neuer went from the smoke of the chimney, nor caried away any blowes in the field, being crammed at home like women and house-doues; and yet they are so impudent and shamelesse, as they dare prefume vnreuerently to your faces to prate of the office and duty of a Generall of an army, and of the desert of triumph, before you I say, who by experience of many a sore cut and wound vpon your bodies in the warres, haue learned to know a good and valiant captaine, from a vile and cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his gowne, and shewed before them all the infinite scars and cuts he had received vpon his brest; and then turning him behind, shewed all fuch places as were not fit to be seene openly, and so turned himself againe to Galba, and faid vnto him: Thou mockest me for that I shew thee: but I reioyce before my countrymen and citizens, that for scruing my country night and day on horse backe, I haue these wounds ypon me which thou feeft. Now get thee about thy businesse and receive their voices: & I will come after, noting them that are naughty & vnthankful citizens, who like to be foothed with flattery, and not flourly comanded, as behoued a General in the warre. These words so reined the hardheaded fouldiers with the curbe of reason, that all the other tribes agreed in one, & granted R.mylius triumphithe order and solemnitie whereof was performed in this sort. First, the people having fet vp fundry fcaffolds; as well in the lifts and field called Circos by the LATINES, where the games and common running of horses & chariots are made, as also about the market place, and in other streets of the citie, in the which the shew of the triumph should passe: they all presented themselues in their best gownes to see the magnificence, and state therof. All the temples of the gods also were set wide open, hanged full of garlands of flowers, and all perfumed within: and there were fet through all the quarters of the citic, numbers of fergeants and other officers holding tipstaues in their hands to order the stragling people, & to keepe them vp in corners and lanes ends, that they should not petter the streets, & hinder the triumph. Furthermore the fight of this triumph was to continue three daies, wherof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the images, tables, and pictures, and statues of wonderfull bignesse, all won and gotten of their enemics, & drawn in the shew vpon 250. chariots. The second day, there were caried vpon a number of carts, all the fairest and richest armour of the Macedonians, aswel of copper, as also of iron and steele, all glistring bright, being newly surbushed, and artificially laid in order (and yet in fuch fore, as if they had bin cast in heapes one vpon another, without taking any care otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) faire burganets vpon targets: habergions, or brigantines and corslets, vpon graues: round targets of the CRETANS, and iauelins of the THRA-CIANS, and arrowes amongst the armed pikes: all this armour and carriage, being bound one to another so trimly (neither being too loofe, nor too straight) that one hitting against another, as they drew them vpon the carts through the city, they made such a sound & noise, as is was fearfull to heare info that the onely fight of these spoiles of the captiues being ouercome, made the fight so much more terrible to behold, after these carts loden with armour, there followed 3000 men, which caried the ready mony in 750 veffels, which weighed about three talents apeece, & every one of them were caried by foure men: & there were other that caried great bolles of filuer, cups and goblets fashioned like pitchers, & other pots to drink in, goodly to behold, aswel for their bignes, as for their great & fingular imbossed works about them. The third day early in the morning the trumpets began to found and fet forwards, founding no march nor fweet note, to beautifie the triumph withall: but they blew out the braue alarum the found at an affault, to give the fouldiers courage for to fight. After them followed fix score goodly fat oxen, having all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & no segaies about their heads, and there went by the certaine yong men, with aprons of needle-worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the facrifice, and yong boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold & filuer, to cast and sprinkle the bloud of the sacrifices about. And after these, followed those that caried all coynes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, and enery one of them weying three talents, as they did before, that carried the great holy cup, which Alimplius had caused to be made of massic gold, set ful of precious stons, weying the weight often talents, to make an offering vnto the gods. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made and wrought after antike fashion, & notable cups of the ancient kings of Macedon: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be short, althe whole cubboord of plate of gold and filuer of king Perfeus. And next them came the chariot of his armour in the which was all king Perfess harnefle, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, followed next the kings children, whom they led prisoners, with the traine of their schoole-masters & other officers, & their sernants, weeping and lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked vpon them, and taught the kings yong children to do the like, to aske mercy & grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety lilechildren, two fonnes and a daughter amongst them, whose tender yeares and lacke of vnderstanding, madethem(poore soules) they could not feele their present misery, which made the people so much the more to pity them, when they saw the poore little infants, that knew not the change of their fortune: fo that for the compassion they had of them, they almost let the father passe without looking vpon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pity, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, fo as this fight brought both pleasure and forow, together to the lookers on, untill they were past and gone a good way out of fight. King Perseus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was cloathed in a blacke gown, wearing a paire of flippers on his feet after his country maner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled mind, opprest with sorow of his most miscrable state & fortune. He was followed with his kinsfolkes, his familiar friends, his officers & houshold feruants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and for rowfull eyes cast fortune, little accounting of their owne mifery. The voyce goeth, that Perfeus fent vnto Amilius Emplin to intreat him, that he should not be led through the city in the shew & sight of the triumph. But Person.

Emylius mocking (as he descrued) his cowardly faint heart, answered: As for that, it was before compatible. and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderstand thereby, that he might rather "". chuse to dye, then liuing to receiue such open shame. Howbeit his heart would not serue him, he was so cowardly, & made so effeminate, by a certain vaine hope he knew not what, that he was Fourthern contented to make one among his owne spoiles. After all this, there followed 400, princely dred crowns crownes of gold, which the cities & towns of Green had purposely sent by their ambassadors of gold for white devnto Amylius, to honour his victory; and next vnto them, he came himself in his chariot triumphing, which was paffing fumptuoufly fet forthand adorned. It was a noble fight to behold and the cites of Greece. yet the person of himselfe only was worth the looking on, without all that great pomp & magnificence. For he was apparrelled in a purple gowne branched with gold, and caried in his right hand a laurell bough, as all his army did befides: the which being deuided by bands and companics, followed the triumphing chariot of their captaine, some of the souldiers singing songs of victory, which the Romains vieto fing in like triumphs, mingling them with merry pleafant toyes, rejoycing at their captaine. Other of the also did fing songs of triumph, in the honor and praise of Almylius noble conquest and victory. He was openly praised, blessed, and honoured of eucry body, and neither hated nor enuied of honest men fauing the ordinary vse of some god. whose property is alwayes to lessen or cut off some part of mans exceeding prosperity & felicitic, mingling with mans life the sence and feeling of good and euill together: because that no liuing person should passe all his time of life, without some aduersity or misfortune, but that such (as Homer faith) should only thinke themselves happy, to whom fortune hath equally forted the good with the cuill. And this I speak, because Amylins had foure sons, two of the which he gate AEmilia in adoption vnto the families of Scipio and of Fabius, as we have faid before: & two other which adversition. he had by his fecond wife, he brought vp with him in his owne house, and were both yet very yong of the which the one died, being fourteene yeares of age five dayes before his fathers triumph: and the other died also three dayes after the pompe of triumph at twelue yeares of age. When this forrowfull chance had befallen him euery one in Rome did pity him in their hearts: but fortunes spite & cruelty did more grieue and fearethe, to see her litle regard towards him. to put into a house of triumph (full of honour and glory, and of sacrifices and ioy) such a pitifull mourning, and mingling of forowes and lamentations of death, amongst such songs of triumph and victory. Notwithstanding this, Amylius taking things like a wife man, thought that he was not only to vie constancy and magnanimity against the sword and pike of the enemy but alike first definitions. alfo against all adversity and enmity of spiteful fortune. So, he wisely weyed and confidered his inhi great present misfortune, with his former prosperitie; and finding his misfortune counterpoised with felicity, and his private griefes cut off with common joy, he gave no place to his forowes & mifchances, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triumph & victory. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last sons, he left not to make his triup hant entry, as you have heard beried the eldelt of his two last ions, he lett not to make his triup nantentry, as you have neared before. And his fecond fon also being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to also he oration in & in face of the whole city he made an oration, not like a difcomforted man, but like one rather bis trauble that did comfort his forowfull countrimen for his mischance. He told them, that concerning for the death of his mens matters, neuer any thing did feare him but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, mi-dealth of thildren, strusting her change and inconstancy, and specially in the last war, doubting for so great prosperity as could be wiffied to be payed home with an after intollerable advertitie & finister chace. " For as I went (faid he) I passed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatick sea, from BRINDES vnto Corry "

in one day: and from thence in fine dayes after, I arrived in the city of Delphes, where I did " facrifice vnto Apollo. And within flue other dayes, I arrived in my campe, where I found mine army in Macenon. And after I had done the facrifice and due ceremonies for purifying of the fame, I presently began to follow the purpose and cause of my coming: so as in fifteene dayes after I made an honorable end of all those wars. But yet, mistrusting fortune alwaies, seeing the prosperous course of my affaires, & considering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers 😘

I needed to feare: I feared forely the would change at my return, when I thould be vpon the fea, ...

bringing home fo goodly and victorious an army, with fo many spoiles, and fo many Prince's " and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was fafely arrived in the haven, & seeing all the city "

vpon their vnfortunate mafter, how much they forowed and bewailed his most hard and cruell

at my returne full of ioy, and of feaft and facrifices: I ftill fulpected fortune, knowing her maner well inough, that she yieth not to gratisfie men so franckly, nor to grant the so great things clearly, without some certaine sparke of enuy waiting on them. Neither did my mind being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the common-wealth, shake off this feare behind me: but that I faw, this home missiap and miserie lighted upon me, enforcing me with mine owne hands in these holy dayes of my triumph, to bury my two yong sons one after another, which I only brought up with me, for the fuccession of my name and house. Wherefore me thinks now I may fay, I am out of all danger, at the least touching my chiefest and greatest misfortune: and do beginto stablish my selse with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other vnlucky or finister chance. For she hath sufficiet. ly counternailed the fauorable victory the gaue you, with the enuious mithap wher with the hath plagued both me and mine: shewing the conquerer and triumpher, as noble an example of mans mifery and weakenesse, as the party conquered, that had bene led intriumphisating that Perseus yet conquered as he is hath this comfort left him, to fee his children liuing, & that the conque. rour, Amylius hath loft his. And this was the fumine of Amylius notable oration he made vnto the people of Rome, proceeding of a noble & honourable disposed mind. And though it pitied him in his heart to fee the strange chance of king Perfeus fortune, and that he heartily desired to helpe him, and to do him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but onely to remoue him from the common prison (which the Romans call Carcer) into a more cleanly and fweeter house: where being straightly garded and looked vnto he killed himselse by abstinence from meate, as the most part of historiographers do write. Yet some writers tell a maruellous strangetale, and manner of his death. For they say the fouldiers that garded him, kept him from fleepe, watching him straightly when sleepe tooke him, and would not suffer him to shut his eye lids (only vpon malice they did beare him, because they could not otherwise hurt him) keeping him awake by force, not fuffering him to take reft; vntil fuch time as nature being forced to give ouer he gaue up the ghost. Two of his fons died also: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent turner and joyner, and was learned, and could speake the Romain stongue very wel. and did write it so trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magistrates of Rome, & did wisely & discreetly behaue himself in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly conquest of the realme of MACEDON, that Amylius conquered another speciall good thing, that made him maruelloufly well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought fo much gold and filter vnto the treasury store of Rome, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, untill the very time and yeare that Hircius and Pansa were Consuls, which was about the beginning of the first wars of Augustus and Antonius. And yet Amylius had one fingular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue & honor him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate and nobility, and did neuer by word nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or please them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he did euer leane to the nobility & good men. And this did Appins afterwards cast in his sons teeth, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefest men of their time, and contending together for the office of Censor: Appins had about him to fauor his suite, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of ancienttime the family of the Appians had ever held on their part, And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himselfe, yet he was at all times fauored and beloued of the common people. Wherupon when Appius faw him come into the market place, followed with men of small quality and base condition, that had bene slaues before, but otherwise could skillfully handle such practifes, bring the people together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voices (if need were) obtains what they would in the affemblies of the citie: he spake out aloud and said: O Paulus Amylius, now hast thou good cause to sigh & mourn in thy grave where thou liest (if the dead do know what we do here on earth) to see Amylins a common sergeant, and Licinius a pratling fellow, how they bring thy fon vnto the dignity of a Cenfor. And as for Scipio, he was alwayes beloued of the common people, because he did fauour them in all things. But Amylius also, although he tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore lesse beloued of the common people, then those that alwaies flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to please them: which the common people did witnesse, as well by other honors and offices they offered him, as in the dignity of the Cefor which they gaue him. For it was the holiest office of alother atthat time, and of greatest power and authority, specially for inquiry and reformation of every mans life and maners. For he that was Cenfor, had authority to put any Senator off the councel, The office and so disgrade him, if he did not worthily behave himselfe according to his place and calling: and author and might name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and tipefor fittest for the place againe. Moreourr, they might by their authority, take from licentious yong men, their horse which was kept at the charge of the common-weale. Furthermore, they be the feffours of the people, and the muster-maisters, keeping books of the number of persons at every mustering. So there appeared numbred in the register booke Amilius made then of them, three hundred seuen and thirty thousand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Aimylius Lepidus named president of the Senate, who had that honour source times before, and did put off the councell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane & moderation he and his companion Martius Philippus kept, vpon view and muster taken of the ROMAINE horfmen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his charge and office, he fell ficke of a difeafethat at the beginning feemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other Amilia danger, fauing that it was a lingring disease, and hard to cure. So, following the counsell of phyfitions, who willed him to go to a city in ITALY called VELIA, he took fea and went thither, and continued there a long time, dwelling in pleasant houses vponthe sea side, quietly and out of all from Rome, noise. But during this time of his absence, the Romaines wished for him many atime and of and dwell ten. And when they were gathered together in the Theaters, to fee the playes and sports, they of pelia. cried out diverse times for him: whereby they shewed that they had a great defire to see him againe. Time being come about when they vsed to make a solemne yearly sacrifice, and Æmilius finding himselfallo in very good perfect health: he returned agains to Rome, where he made sa-crifice with the other priests, all the people of Rome gathered about him, rejoycing much to fee him. The next day after, he made another particular facrifice, to giue thankes vnto the gods for recouery of his health. After the facrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and sate him downe to dinner: he fuddenly fell into a rauing (without any perfeuerance of fickneffe The death fpied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went from him, in fuch fort, of Amilian that he died within three daies after lacking no necoffery thing that are could be in Rome. that he died within three daies after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly man could have, to make him happy in this world. For he was even honoured at his funerals, and his vertue was Amilion adorned with many goodly glorious ornaments, neither of gold, filuer, nor inorie, nor with foreigh. other fuch sumptuous nesses or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and goodwill of the people, all of them confessing his vertue and well doing; and this did not only his naturall countrimen performe in memory of him, but his very enemies also. For all those that met in Rome by chance at that time, that were either come out of Spaine, from Genva, or out of Mace-DON, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselues vnder the cossin where his body lay, to helpe to carry him: and the old men followed his body to accompany the same, calling Amilius the benefactor, sauiour, and father of their countrey. For he did not onely intreat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued: but all his life time he was euer ready to pleasure them: and to set forwards their causes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neare kinfinen. The inventory of all his goods after his death, did Amieus feant amount vnto the fumme of three hundred, threefcore, and ten thousand filuer Drachmas, which his two formes did inherin. But Saids heing the voncer left all his rishe was which his two sonnes did inherit. But Scipio being the yonger, left all his right vnto his elder brother Fabius, because he was adopted into a very rich house, cause, as if they would and should have died for themselves, and not rather for their countrey and friends. And alfowhen they were dead. Pelopidas was buried by the allies and confederates of the city of THEBES, for whose cause he was slaine; and Marcellus in like manner, by the enemies sclues that had slaine him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be wished for in such a case: but the other is farre aboue it, and more to be wondred at: That the enemy himselse should honour his valiantnesse and worthinesse that hurt him, more then the office of friendship performed by a thankfull friend. For nothing moueth the enemy more to honour his dead enemy, then the admiration of his worthinesse: and the friend sheweth friendship many times, rather for respect of the benefits he hath received, then for the love he beareth to his vertue.

THE LIFE OF Aristides.

RISTIDES the fon of Lysimachus, was certainly of the tribe of Antio chides, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and wealth they diverfly write of him. For some fay, he lived poorely all the dayes of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reason of their pouerry, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. And many of the oldest writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Demetrius Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary: that he knew certaine lands Aristides had in the village of PHALERIA, which did yet beare the name of Aristides lands, in the which his body is buried. And furthermore, to shew that he was well to liue, and that his house was rich & wealthy, he bringeth forth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare Mayor or Prouost of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymos, because the yeare tooke the name of him that had it yearely. And they say, he came to it by drawing of the beane, according to the ancient vse of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the faid office: in which election none were admitted to draw the beane, but such as were highest set in their subsidie bookes, according to the value and rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacosiomedimnes, as you would fay, those that might dispend fine hundred bushels of wheate by the yeare, & vpwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was banished by the Ostracismon, which banisheth the Nobility & great rich men onely: whom the common people enuie, because of their greatnesse; and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes, is, that he left of his gift, three soored stooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer vp, as have won the victory in comedies, tragedies, or other fuch like pastimes, where they themselues had borne the charge. And those three footed stooles remaine there yet, which they say were given by Arifides and haue this inscription vpon them: The tribe of Antiochides wanne the victorie, Aristides defrayed the charges of the games, and Archefratus the Poet taught them to play his comedies. The last reason, though it seeme likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was poore euen from his birth, and alwayes lived in great ponertie) and Plato the Philosopher, tooke vpon them to defray the charges of games that were of no small expence: the one having borne the charges of flute players at THEBES, and the other the dance of the children which danced in a round at ATHENS: towards the furnishing of which charges Dion the Syracus an gaue Plato mony, and Pelopidas also gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not spoken that vertuous men should alwayes refuse the gifts of their Good men friends; and that they might not in some fort accept their friends courtesie offered them; but because they should thinke it vncomely and dishonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themselves, or to spare and hoord vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done. or any publike shew to be made, not tending to their private benefite: in such a case they should not refuse their friends louing offer and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius saith, the three footed stoole was offered up in the temple of Bacchus, Panetius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was deceived by the femblance of the name. For fince the time of the wars of y MEDES, vnto the beginning of the war of PELOPONNESVS, in all the registers and records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common playes, there were found but two men bearing name of Aristides that obtained victory; and neither of them both was fonne vnto Lysimachus, whom we write of at this present. For the one is expresly named the son of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Aristides we now speake of as appeareth easily by the writing and orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we have vied in GRECE ever fince Euclides time. Moreouer it is easie to be knowne, by the name of the Poet Archistratus that is adjoying to it: for there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the wars of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of Peloponnesus, many do put him in for an Author and maker of rimes and fongs that were fung in common dances. Yet for all Panatius objections, the matter is to be better looked into, and confidered of. But for the Ostracismon banishment, it is true, that fuch as were great men in estimation about the comon people, either in same, nobility, or eloquence, they onely were subject vnto this banishment. For Damon himselfe, being Pericles schoolemaster; was banished, only because the common people thought him too wife. Moreouer, Idomaneus writeth, that Aristides was their prouost for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voice of the ATHENIANS that chose him. And if he were prouost fince the journey of PLA- was too TAES, as Demetrius writeth, it is likely inough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable service, which other were wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Aristides, but also Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that he had not only a house of his own, but also threescore and ten Scientes minas atvsurie, which Criton gave him interest for. But now to our story againe. Aristides was Clifthenes very friend, he that restored the gouernement at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty tyrants, and did renerence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACED EMONIANS for his lawes, about all the men in his time: and therefore he euer fauoured the state of Arisfocratia, that is, where the noble men rule, and haue the fouer aignitie. How beit he euer had Themistocles (Neocles sonne) his continual aduersarie, as taking part with the contrary, and defending the popular state of gouernement. Some say, that being schollers, and brought vp together, they were statistical euer contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were it in sport, or in matter of earnest and euer after, men beganne to see the natural linclination of them both, by their contrarie affections. For Themistocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and subtill, and would venture on any thing vpon light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, temperate, constant and wealth. maruellous well staied, who would for no respect be drawneaway from equity and instice, nei- Themston ther would lie, flatter, nor abufe any body, though it were but in sport. Notwithstanding Ari- cles dispofus of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne first of light loue, and that it grew to greatesse defiding by processe of time betweenethem: (for faith he) both the one and the other of them fell in zature.

mon thefts the officers of the city did commit, he stopped the theeues mouthes that so highly praifed and commended him for so honest a man: but yet of the noble and honest citizens he wasmuch commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of Per-

SIA, Was come with all his nauy to go aland about MARATHON, in the countrey of ATTICA, vpon pretence (as he faid) to be reuenged only of the Athenians, that had burnt the city of

SARDIS, but indeed of mind to conquer all GRECE, and to destroy the whole country before haue growne among them, and perswaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counfell, that had best experience in the war. And so he did much advance Militades honor. For after that Aristides had once yeelded his authority vnto him, every one of the rest did the like when it came to their turne; and fother all summitted themselues vnto the rule and leading. But on the day of the battel, the place where the Athenians were most combred, was in the middest of the battell, where they had set the tribes of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend altheir force, & made their greatest fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles & Aristides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the tribe

Leontites, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying campe at Marathon, with histribe and countreymen, to looke to the prisoners and spoile they had won of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceived the opinion they had of his wifdome. For notwithstanding there was great store of gold and filuer, much apparell, moueables, and other infinite goods and riches in all their tents and paullions, and in the ships also they

them, nor the enuy they conceived one against another, but cotinued against each other in matters of state: such were their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themistocles sought the way to winne friends, by whose meanes he came to great preferment in short time, and had made himselfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to gouerne the city of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall: The gods forbid (quoth he) I should ever occupie the place of a governour, where my friends should not find more fauour then strangers, that do me no pleasure. But Aristides taking another course by himselfe, would not stand vpon his friends in genernment. First, because he would do no man wrong with pleasuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requests. Secondly, because he saw many rulers and men of authority bold to do iniustice and manifest wrong, bearing themselues upon their friends: but he carried this opinion, that no honest man or good citizen, should trust to any bolstering of friends, but to his owne instand vpright doings. Notwithstanding, Aristides perceining that Themistocles did rashly alter many things, and euer encountered all his wayes, and hindered his doings, he was enforced formetime to croffe Themissocies againe, and to speake agains that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but most to hinder his credite and authority, which increased still through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a little to difappoint sometime athing that might have fallen out well for the common-wealth, rather then by giving him the head, to fuffer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themistocles having preferred a matter very profitable for the common-wealth, Aristides was fo him, that when the counsell brake vp after Themistocles motion was rejected, he spake it openly before them all that the common wealth of ATHENS would never prosper vntill they both men, Another time, Arifides moued a matter to the people, which diverse were against, but yet conflancie. found him very constant and resolute in matters of state, what soeuer happened: which wan him dation of the ancient foothfayer Amphiaraus, to this effect:

ARISTIDES.

He will not onely feeme, a inst man by his face, But inft indeed he will be found, and vertue still embrace With all his thought and foule, from whence there may proceed Grane counsels, for to beautifie his countries crowne indeed.

All the people straight cast their eyes vpon Aristides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all other most described the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stout and resolute, not only to resist fauour & friendship, but to reject hate and anger also. For in case of instice, neither could friendfhip make him go awry for his friends sake: nor enuy could moue him to do iniustice, to his very enemy. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his in fuite of law, and did prosecute it to indgement insomuch as after the plaint was read, the Indges were so angry with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would have give fentence against him. But Arifides rifing from his place, went and kneeled at the Iudges feete with the offender his enemie, and befought them to give him leave to speake, to instiffe and defend his cause, according to the course of law. Another time he being Judge betweene two private men that pleaded before him, one of them faid vnto him: Aristides, this fellow mine aduer fary here, hath done you great iniury. My friend (quoth Aristides againe) I pray thee tell me only the iniury wife sping, he hath done thee, for I am Judge here to do thee right, and not my selfe. Moreouer, he being loue with Stefileus, borne in the Ile of CAOs. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not eafily from much against it as Themistocles purpose took no place. Moreouer Aristides was so carnest against were laid in Barathrum, which was a prison or hole, wherinthey put all theeues and condemned it went with him. And when the Judge or President of the counsell did put it to the people, to know their allowance of it: Arifides perceiving by the arguments made against it, that the matter he preferred was hurtful to the comon-wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not have it passe. Many times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would have a thing go forward, for feare lest Themistocles spitetowards him, would hinder the benefite of the common-wealth. They great commendation. For he was never the prouder for any honour they gave him, nor thought himselfe disgraced for any ouerthrow he received: being alwayes of this mind, that it was the duty of an honest citizen, to be euer ready to offer his body and life to do his countrey service, without respect and hope of reward of money, or for honour and gloric. Therefore when certaine verses were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies of Aschilus made in commenchosen high treasurer of all the revenues of ATHENS, did declare that all the officers before him, Aillide & other his late predeceffours, had greatly robbed and spoiled the common treasure, but specially Themissocles: who was a wife man, and of great judgement, but yet somewhat light fingered. Therefore when Aristides was to give vp his account, Themistocles and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abusing his office, and followed him so hard, that through their practife they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the noblest drillides citizens feeing what injury they offered Ariftides, tooke his cause in hand, and found meanes to desided and procure the people not only to release the fine imposed upon him, butto restore him againe to condemned, his office of high treasurer for the yeare following: in the which he seemed to repent his former his office. ftraightnesse in gouernment the yeare before, & dealt more favourably with those he had to do driftedes with, and would not examine enery thing fo straightly as he did before. Wherupon such as were feel, and he theeues and stealers of the treasure of the comon-wealth, did maruellously praise and like him, made treasure and became futers for him to continue in the office. But when the day of election came, that the futer again. ATHENIANS would chuse him againe, Aristides selse reproued them, and said: When I Aristides faithfully discharged the duty of mine office committed to me by you, I then received shame openly reand reprochat your hands: and now that I have diffembled, not feeming to feethe thefts and robberies done vpon your treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good citizen. 12 the com-But I would you knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more ashamed of the honour you do me monwealth now, then I was of the fine you did fet voon me, when you condemned me the last yeare: and I flesh their am fory to speake it, that you should thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then Prails. to preserve the common-wealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the com-

him: the ATHENIANS chose ten captaines to go to the warres among whom Militades was Militades the chiefest man of authority. But Aristides drew very neare him in reputation and credite, be- diefe of cause he did very good service in obtaining the victory, specially when he agreed with Miltia- the ten cepdes in counfell, to giue battell vpon the barbarous people: and also when he willingly gaue trent e-Milliades the whole rule and order of the army. For enery one of the ten captaines did by turnes gain Da. leade the whole army for one whole day: and when Aristides turne came about, he gaue his this the preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no shame, but Persuas honour for them to be ruled by the wisest. Thus by his example he appealed all strife that might Lieutenans one another: so as the barbarous people at the last being ouerthroune, they made them flie, and draue them to their ships. But when they were imbarked and gone, the captaines of the ATHE-visionie. NIANS perceiuing they made not towards the Iles, which was their direct course to returne into of the Per-

Asia, but that they were driven backe by storme of wind and pyrries of the sea, towards the coast of ATTICA & the city of ATHENS, fearing lest they might find ATHENS vnfurnished for defence, and might fet vpon it: they thereupon sentaway presently nine tribes that marched thither with such speed, as they came to Athens the very same day, and lest Aristides in the

had taken of theirs: he was not so couetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other to meddle with the vnleffe by stealth some prouided for themselues. As' amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres priefts, called Dadouchos, as you would fay, the torch-bearer, (for in the The wided fecret facrifices of Ceres, his office was to hold the torch) whom when one of the barbarous peopart of Cal. ple faw, and how he wore a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke him for fome king, and falling on his knees at his feet, kitfed his hand, and shewed him great store of gold he had hidden and buried in a dirch. But Callias, like a most cruell, and cowardly wretch of all other on the earth, took away the gold, and killed the poore foule that had shewed him the place, because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the comicall Poet do call those that came of him in mockerie, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a dirch because of the gold that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Ariftides was chosen prouost of ATHEN'S for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the journey of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they fet in order their prouosts of Athens for the yeare, since Xanthippides time, there appeared no one name of Ariftides in that yeare that Mardonius the king of Persians Lieutenant was ouerthrowne by Platæes, which was many yeares after: but contrariwife, they find Ariffides enrolled among the prouosts immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commend Aristides iustice, before all his other vertues and qualities; because that vertue is most common and in vse in our life, and deliuereth most benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man. obtained the worthiest name that one could have, to be called by the whole city, a just man. This furname was neuer defired of kings, princes, nor of tyrants, but they alwaies delighted to be furnamed, some Poliorcetes, to say, conquerors of cities: other Gerauni, to say, lightning or terrible: other Nicanores, to fay fubduers: and some other, Atrand Hieracles, to fay, Eagles or Faulcons, or fuch like birds that prey: defiring rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the praise and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that rifeth by vertue and goodnesse. Yet not with standing, God whom they desire most to be likened to, doth excell all humane nature in three feuerall things: in immortality, in power, and in vertue, of which three, vertue is the most honourable & precious thing. For as the naturall Philosophers reason, all the foure elements & Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and fo are force and power. earth-quakes, lightning, terrible ftormes, running rivers, and inundations of waters: but as for The graife inflice and equity, no man is partaker of them, faue onely God, by meanes of reason and vnderof inflice.

The graife inflice and equity, no man is partaker of them, faue onely God, by meanes of reason and vnderof inflice. standing. Therefore, because men commonly have three sundry affections of the gods: the first, that they thinke them bleffed: the fecond, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleffed, for the eternity and immortalitie of their godhead: that they feare them, because of their omnipotency and power: and that they loue and worship them, for their instice and equitie. And yet notwithstanding, of those three, men do couet immortality, which no flesh can attaine vnto: and also power, which dependeth most vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodnesse haue made vs capable. But here they shew themselves fooles. For Iustice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authority, seeme divine and celestiall: where without instice, and dealing vniustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the world. But now againe to Aristides. This furname of a just man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles practise: who gaue it out euery where, that Aristides had ouerthrowne all iustice, because by consent of the parties he ele envieth was euer chosen Arbitrator to endall controuersies; and that by this meanes he secretly had procured the absolute power of a king, not needing any gard or soldiers about him. The people moreover being grown very diffolute & licencious, by reason of the victory of Marathon, and feeking to haue all things passe by them and their authority, began now to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any private man should go before the rest in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all shires of Attica into the city of Athens, and so banished Aristides with the Ostracismon; disguising the enuy they bare to his glory with the name withthe o- of feare of tyranny. For this maner of banishment called ofracismon, or Exestracismon, was no fraisines, ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to give it an honest cloke, they of the Offra. faid it was onely a pulling downe and tying short of too much greatnesse and authority, exceeding far the matter and countenance of a popular state. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwife, then a gentle meane to qualifie the people's enuy against some private person: which enuy bred no malice to him whose greatnesse did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for ten yeares. But afterwards when by practife, this Oftracifmon banishment was laid vpon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished, they never Hoperbolus after yield it any more at ATHENS. And by the way it shall not be amisse to tell you here, why the last man and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of A. banished THENS at that time, and they both were euer at fquare together; a common thing among f great offracijus, men. They perceiving now by the peoples affembling, that they went about to execute the 6- The could stracismon, were maruellously affraid it was meant to banish one of them: wherefore they spake of Hyperbo. together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and joyned them in one tribe ment, together, infomuch, when the most voices of the people were gathered to condemne him that should be banished, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended. to see the Offracisson so embased and scorned, that they never after would vie it againe, and so left it off for euer. But briefly to let you vnderstand what the Oftracismon was, and after what fort they vied it; ye are to know, that at a certain day appointed, enery citizen caried a great fliell in tion of the his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into Ofracisa certaine place railed about with woodden barres in the market place. Then, when every man had brought in his shell, the magistrates and officers of the city did count and tell the number of them; for if there were leffethen 6000 citizens, that had thus brought these shells together, the Ofracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart every mans name written in these shels: and whose name they found written by most citizens, they proclaimed him by found of trumpet, a banished man for ten yeares, during which time not with standing, the party did enioy al his goods. Now every man writing thus his name in a shel, whom they would have banished: it is reported there was a plaine man of the countrey (very simple) that could neither write nor reade, who came to Ariftides (being the first man he met with) and gaue him his shell, plaineman praying him to write Aristides name vpon it. He being abashed withall, did aske the countrey shat came man, if Arifides had euer done him any displeasure. No, said the country man, he neuer did me with his hurr, nor I know him not but it grieves me to heare every man call him a just man. Aristides hearing him fay fo, gaue him no aniwer, but wrote his own name vpon the shell, and deliuered it a- problems. gaine to the country man. But as he went his way out of the city, he lift up his hands to heaven, fidename. and made a prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, befeeching the gods that the ATHENI- int. ANS might neuer haue fuch troubles in hand, as they should be compelled tocall for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three yeares after, when Xernes king of Parsia came with his Arisides army through the countries of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, & entred into the heart of the coun-called from try of ATTICA, the ATHENIAM's renoking the law of their oftracifmon, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, because they were affraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example should move many other to do the like; wherin they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man; for before that he was called home, he continually trauelled up and downe, perfuading and incouraging the Grecians to maintaine and defend their liberty. After that law was repealed by proclamation, & that Themificeles was chosen the only Lieutenant general of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aid and affift him in althings, as well with his trauell, as also with his counsell; and thereby wan his enemies great honour, because it stood upon the safety and preservation of his countrey. For when Euribiades, Generall of the army of the GRECIANS, had determined to for sake the Ile of SALAMINA, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and had enuironed the Iles all about, and the mouth of the arme of the straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Ile of Agina with a maruellous boldnesse, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous ships and sleete, and by good hap got in the night into Themistocles tent, and callinghim out, spake with him there in this fort: Themistocles, if we be both wife, it is high time we should now leave off this vaine enuy and spite we deflides haue long time borne each other, and that we should enter into another fort of enuy more ho- atti and nourable and profitable for vs both: I meane, which of vs two should do his best endeauour to faue Grece: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counfelling you the best, and executing your commandement: considering you are the man alone that will roundlieft come vnto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we should

should hazard battell by sea within the straight of SALAMINA, and that assoone as might be possible. But if our friends and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your enemies do helpe it forward. For it is faid, that the fea both before and behind vs, & round about vs, is couered all ouer with their ships, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force, and in spight of their hearts, to fight and bestirre them like men: because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape, nor to slie. Whereunto Themistocles answered I am fory, Aristides, that herein your honesty appeareth greater then mine: but fince it is fo, that you have deserved the honor in beginning, and procuring fuch an honourable and commendable strife betweene vs. I will henceforth indeauour my selfe to exceed you in continuing this your delire. After which answer, he told Aristides, how he purposed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuice, and to perswade him that there was no other way to saue GRECE, but to fight by sea : for Eurybiades gaue more credit to Aristides perswasions, then he did to Themistocles words: for when all the captaines were called to councell, to determine whether they should give battell, or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN faid to Themistocles, that his counsel did not like Aristides at all as it feemed, because he spake neuer a word to it being present. Aristides answered him straight, that he vtterly mistooke him. For (quoth he) if I did not thinke his counsell good, I would not hold my peace as I do:but now I am mute, not for any goodwill I beare him, but because I find his counfell wife and found. While the captaines of the GRECIANS were reasoning in this fort, Aristides feeing Psyttalea (a litle lland before Salamina within the straight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valiantest and lustiest fouldiers he had of all his countrey men, into the least foystes or pinnaces he had among all his galleys: and went with them. and landed in that Ile, and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the fivord enery man, taking the chiefest of them only prisoners: among which were three sons of Sandauce, the kings fifter, whom he fent vnto Themistocles. These three Lords were all slain by the commandement of Euphrantidas the foothfayer, and facrififed to Bacchus Omestes, as to fay, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw flesh, and all vpon an Oracle they had received. That done, Aristides dispersed his souldiers about the Ile, to receive all such as were by fortune of war, or of the sea, cast into the Handsto the end that no enemy of theirs shold scape their hands, nor any of his friends should perish. For the greatest fleete of all their ships, & the sharpest encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Iland; and therefore the tokens of triumph were fet there. After the battell was won, Themistocles to feele Aristides opinion, said vnto him: We have done a good peece of service, but yet there is another behind of greater importance, & that is this: We must bring all Asia into Evrope, which we may easily do, if we saile with all speed to the straight of Hellespont, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Aristides cried out, Stay there, neuer speake of that but I pray you let vs rather seeke all the waies we can, how to drive this barbarous king out of GRECE, left if we keepe him in still with so great an army (and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we drive him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our selues, we cannot tell to what. When Themissocies had heard his opinion, he fecretly fent the Eunuke Arnaces his prisoner, vnto king Xerxes, to advertise him fro him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpose, which was fully bent to have broken vp the bridge he had made at the straight of Hellespont to passe ouer his army and that he was the willinger to let him vnderstand it, that he might the better prouide for the safety of his person. King Xerxes xervises being noted with this aduertisement, tooke straight his journey, and with all speed went to re-Mardonius couer the straight of Hellespont, & lest Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in Grece, with three hundred thousand of the best souldiers of his army. This Mardonius was maruellously Greewith dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great army he had by land, and he did threaten them also by his letters he wrote vnto them: You have (said he) with your ships by sea, o. uercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fields of BOEOTIA, are very faire and large for horsemen and sootemen to make proofe of their valiantnesse, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote letters to the ATHENIANS, by the king his mafters commandement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their city againe, to give them a great pension, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GRECE, so they would give ouer, and leave off these warres. The LACED EMONIANS being forthwithaduerrised of his letters written to the ATHENIANS.

and fearing left they would have bene perswaded by them: fent their Ambassadours withall fpeed to ATHENS, to pray them to fend their wives and children vnto Sparta, and also to offer them victuals, to relieve their poore old people, because of the great scarcity that was at A-THENS, for that their city was burnt and razed, and all their country besides destroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIAN'S having heard the offers of the Ambaffadors of LACED E-Mon, madethe a maruellous answer through Arilides cousel, & this it was: That they bare with The mble MON, made the a marue Hous answer through Aristans could, of this it was: I flat they have with mind of the the barbarous people, though they thought all things were to be fold for gold & filter, because Athenians. they effeemed nothing more precious nor better in this world, then to be richard wealthy: but on the other fide, they were greatly offended with the LACED AMONIANS, that they onely regarded the present pouerty, and necessity of the Athenians, and did forget their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preservation of GRECE, by offering them victuals to line withall, The people approuing this answer, Arifides then caused the Ambassadours of Sparra to come to the assembly, and commanded them to tell the La-CEDEMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold aboue, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any fumme of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GRECE. And to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed the Sunne, and faid vnto him: So long as yonder Sunne keepeth his course about the world, so long will the Athenians be mortall enemies unto the Persians, because they have spoiled and destroyed all their country, and have defiled and burnt the temples of their gods. Besides, he willed that the priefts, by commandement of the people, should excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to fend vnto the Persians to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the second time to ouerrun the country of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them againe into the Ilcof SALAMINA, and then they fent Aristides Ambassadour vnto the LACED EMONIANS. He sharpely tookethem vp, and reproued their sloth & negligence, because they had againe forfaken ATHENS, and left it to the spoile of the barbarous people: & prayed them yet they would looke to faue the rest of GRECE. The Ephori(which were certaine officers that ruled all things within the city of Sparta) when they had heard Arifides perswasions, straight tooke order for aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheere, keeping that day one of their folemne feasts they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they sent out fine thousand citizens born in Sparta, into the field, al proper men & valiant soldiers, enery one of them carying with him feuen Ilotes (which are the country men and flaues in the country of LACED AMONIA) not making the Ambassadors of ATHENS priny to it at al. Wherfore Aristides came againe another time into their counsell, to coplaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and faid he dreamed, or elfe he mocked them: for their army which they had sent against the strangers (for so they called the Persians) was already at the city of O-RESTION in ARCADIA. Aristides hearing their answer, replied, that they were to blame to mock them in that fort, to fend away their men so secretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceive their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomineus in his flory reporteth the matter thus in every point: notwithstanding, in the decree that was made to send Ambassadours to Sparta, Aristides is not named for Ambassadour, but there are other appointed : as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Ariftides was cho- Arifides fen by voices of the people, Lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS, in this warre against Lieutenant the Persians, and went varo the campe of the Grecians by the city of Plathes, with the difference of t eight thousand footemen well armed and appointed. There he found king Pausanias the onely niante-Generall of all the whole power and army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the fotce Mardoniof Sparta: and there came daily into his campe one after another, a maruellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incamped all along the river of Asopvs: but because their campe stretched out a maruellous way in length, king of Lacedamon they were not intrenched at al, but had only fortified a peece of ground foure square with a wal. General of about, which was ten furlongs on energy fide, to place all their cariage and chiefest things in. And all Greece. for the GRECIANS againe, the soothsayer Tisamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Paufanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they should have the victory, so they did not assault oracles of atall, but only defend. And Arifides, that had fent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, in the the vitterio name of § ATHENIANS, had answer: They should ouercome their enemies, so they did sacrifise of Places.

and make speciall prayers vitto Inpiter and Iuno of mount CITH ERON, vitto Pan, and vitto the Nymphes Sphragitides, and also vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Damocrates, Hypsion, Acteon, and Polyidus: and so that they did hazard battel also within their own territories. and in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and of Proferpina. This Oracle troubled Aristides maruelloufly, because the demy gods whom they had commandement to do sacrifice vnto, were the founders and ancestors of the PLAT ÆIANS: and the caue of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the mount CITHERON, looking towards the West, where the Sunne setteth in Somer. They fay there was an Oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many inhabitants thereabouts, & bestraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepti, as who would fay, taken with the Nymphes. And againe, to tell the ATHENIANS they should have the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and within their owne teritory; it was even to fend them backe again into the country of ATTICA. Arifi-Arymnessus des being thus perplexed, Arimnessus captaine of the PLATEIANS, had such a vision in the night in his fleepe. He thought, that Impiter the fauiour did appeare vnto him, and asked him what the GRECTANS intended to do: and that he answered: My Lord, we must to morrow remoue our campe into the territories of ELEVSIN, & there we wil fight with the barbarous people, according to the comandement the Oracle of Apollo hath given vs. Then that Impiter replied, that they were greatly deceived: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within the territories of the PLAT EIANS, and that they should find it true, if they considered it well. Arimneflus having plainly seene this vision in his sleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he straight fent for the oldest citizens, and confidering with them where this place should be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHERON, by the city of NYSIA, there was an old temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleusinian, and of her daughter Proserpina. When he heard them fay to, he went straight and told Aristides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to fet an army in battell ray, that had but few horsemen: for that the foot of mount CITHERON did let the horsemen, they could not go to the place where the temple stood, and where the plaine and valley did end: besides also, that the chappell of Androcrates was even in that place. which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And because they should lacke nothing to hinder the expresse commandement of the Oracle for hope of victorie, the PLATEIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and aduice) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLAT ÆE's should betaken away towards ATHEN's side, & that the land therof shold be given clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, because they should fight with the barbarous people in their owne land, for the defence and preservation of GRECE, according to the commandement of the Oracle. This noble gift and prefent of the PLAT ÆIANS was fo famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great having conquered the Empire of As 1 A, built vp the wals again of the city of PLATÆEs, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympical, that Alexander had done the PLAT EIANS that honor and dignitie, for a memorial and honour of their magnanimitie, because in the warre against the Persian stans, they had freely and liberally given away their land vnto the Athenians, for the fafety of the Grecians: and had shewed themselues of a noble courage also, and very willing to defend the state of GRECE. Now when the army of the GRECIANS came to be fet in order of battell, there fell a firife betweene the Athenians & the Thegeates, because the Athenians would needs (according to their old custome) have the left wing of the battel if the LACED EMONIANS had the right wing; and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would have the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous acts & notable service of their ancestors in former wars, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Aristides stept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobility and valiantnesse: and as for you, my Lords of Sparta (faid he) and you also my masters of Grece: we tell you, that the place neither giueth nor taketh vertue away, and we do affure you that wherfoeuer you place vs, we will so defend and keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemish the honour we have won in former foughten battels and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to brag of our anceftors doings, but to flew our felues valiant in defence of all GRECE. For this battell will make good proofe of all the GRECIANS, how much estimation enery city, enery captaine, and particular person will deserve for his part. When Aristides had spoken, the captaines and all other of the counfell concluded in fauour of the ATHENIANS, that they should have one of the wings of the battell. But by this meanes all GRECE stood in maruellous garboile at that time, and the flate of the ATHENIANS specially in great danger. For a number of the noblest citizens of A-THENS, and that brought great substance with them to the wars, being now at low state, and in pouerty, their goods being spent and gone, and seeing themselues discountenanced, not bearing that rule and authoritie in the commonwealth they were wont to do, because other were called to authority, and preferred to the offices of the cities they gathered together, and met at a house The confidence in the city of Plat Es, and there conspired to ouerthrow the authority of the people at A-resposite THENS: and if they could not obtain their purpose, then that they would rather lose all, and wenof dberray their country vnto the barbarous people. While these things were practised in the camp shens. many being of the conspiracy, Aristides came to an inckling of it, and was maruellously affraid, because of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter; being of such importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderstand the whole conspiracy, little knowing what a number might be drawn into this treason, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was just, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persons onely of the great number to be apprehended, & of these eight, the two first whom they would have indited as principals, and were most to be burdened for the conspiracy, Assenines of the town of LAMPRA, & Egefias of the towne of ACHARNA, they found meanes to flie out of the camp, and to fauethemselves. And for the other, Arisides setthem at liberty, and gaue them occasion that were not discouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: saying, that the battel should be their judge, where they shold purge themselves of all accusations laid against them, and shew the world also, that they never had any other intention but honest & good, towards their country. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the Gaecians, had fent all his horfemen (wherein he was farre stronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmish with them. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITH ERON, in ft. ong places and full of stones, saving the three thousand ME GARI- Mount CI. ANS, that camped in the plaine; by reason whereof, they were fore troubled & hurt, by the horsmen of the barbarous people that fet vpon them on every fide, for they might charge them where they would. In so much, in the end, perceiuing they alone could no longer refist the force of so great a multitude of the barbarous people, they sent with all speed possible to Paulantas, to prayhim to fend them prefent aide. Paulinias hearing this newes, and feeing in his owne fight the campe of the MEGARIANS almost couered with shot and darts which the barbarous people threw at them, and that they were compelled to fland close together in a litle corner: he wist not what to do. For to go thither in person with the LACED EMONIANS that were footemen heavy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them. So he proved to put some ambitious desire & enuy of honor, among the private captaines & generals of the army of the other GR E-CIANS, which were then about him: to fee if he could moue any mans courage and defire, to offer himselfe willingly to aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Ari-Stides, who promised to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field (one of the valiantest captaines that served under him) with his company of 300 chosen men, and certain shot mingled amongst them. These souldiers were ready in a moment, & marchedstraight in battel ray, a great pace towards y barbarous people. Massitius, that was General of the horsmen of the Persians, agoodly tall man, perceiuing their coming towards him: turnedhis horse, and galloped to them. The ATHENIANS tarried him, and kept their ground, and the borse. the encounter was very hote, because both the one and the other side did the best they could at Persides. this first onset to put the rest of the battell in icopardy: and they fought so long, that Massificus horse was shot through the body with an arrow, that put him to such paine as he neuer left slinging, til he cast his master on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not rife againe, aswel for the weight of his armor, as for that the ATHENIANS came so fodainly vpon him. And not with standing there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could find no way how to kil him, he was so throughly armed & loden with gold, copper, and iron, not only upon his body and his head, but also on his legs and armes whill at the length there was one that thrust y head of his dart through his bener, & so killed him. The Persians Massins perceiuing that, fled immediatly, & forfooke the body of their General. Shortly after it appea- flains by red to the GRECIANS, that they had sped well at this skirmish, not because they had slain many he Athericans. enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the losse of Masistius. For his deathdid so grieue them, that they polled themselues, they clipped off their horseand moyles haires, and filled befides all the field thereabouts with pitifull cries & fhreekes, as those that had lost the valiantest and chiefest man of authority of all their camp, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this first skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their campe, and would not come into the field many dayes after for the foothfayers did promife both fides the victorie, as much the Persians, as the Grecians, fo they did but only defend and contrariwife, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowne, that did affault. But Mardonius finding victuals waxed scant, and that they were stored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GRE. CIANS daily grew stronger by continual repaire to their camp, the longer he delayed in the end he refolued to tarry no longer, but to passe the river As or vs the next morning by breake of the day, and fuddenly to fet upon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the captaines warning the night before what they should do, because every man should be ready. But about midnight there came a horseman without any noise at all, so neere to the GRECIANS campe, that he spake to the watch, and told them he would speake with Aristides Generall of the ATHENIANS. Ariflides was called for straight, and when he came to him, the horseman said vnto Aristides: I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great goodwill I beare you, haueput my ting of Ma- felf in the greatest danger that may be, to come at this present time to advertise you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will give you battell: because your enemies sudden coming vpon you. should not make you affraid, being suddenly charged, and should not hitter also your valiferret count ant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight, but onely scarcity of victuals that forceth him to do it confidering that the Prognosticators are all against it that he should give you battel both by reason of the ill tokens of their facrifices as also by the answers of their Oracles, which hath put all the army in a maruellous feare, & stand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at a venture or els if he wil needs lie still to be starued to death for very famine. After king Alexander had imparted this fecret to Arifides, he prayed him to keepe it to himselfe, and to remember it in time to come. Arifides answered him then, that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of so great importance as that from Paulanius, who was the Liuetenant generall of their whole army: notwithstanding, he promised him he would tell it no man else before the battel, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he did affure him, they should all acknowledge his great fauour and goodwill shewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe : and Ariftides also went immediatly to Paulavias tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the private captaines were fent for straight to councell, and there order was giuen, that every man should have his bands ready, for they should fight in the morning. So Pausanias atthat time (as Herodotus writeth) faid vnto Aristides, that he would remove the A-THENIANS from the left to the right wing, because they should have the Persians themsclues right before them, and that they should fight so much the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they had ouercome them before in the first encounter;and that himself would take the left wing of the battel, where he should encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS fide. But when all the other private captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderstood it, they were maruellous angry with Pausaias, and said he did them wrong, and had no reason to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, & onely to remoue them, as if they were flaues, to be appointed at his pleafure, now on the one fide, then on the other, & to fet them in fight with the valiantest soldiers they had of all their enemies. Then faid Aristides to them, that they knew not what they faid, and how before they misliked, and did striue with the TEGEATES, onely for having the left wing of the battell; and when it was granted, they thought themselves greatly honoured that they were preferred beforethem, by order of the captaines: and now where the LACEDEMO-NIANS were willing of themselues to give them the place of the right wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminence of the whole army; they do not thankfully take the honor offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit given them to fight against the Persians felues, their ancient enemies, and not against their naturall countreymen anciently descended of them. When Arifides had vsed all these perswasions vnto them, they were very welcontented to change place with the LACED AMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came against them, had no them, had no better hearts nor weapons, then those whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For faid they, they have the same bowes, the same rich imbrodered pownes, the fame golden chaines and carcanets of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardly bodies & faint hearts: where we have also the same weapons & bodies we had, and our hearts more lively and couragious then before, through the fundry victories we have fince gotten of them. Further, we have this advantage more; that we do not fight as our other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our city and country only but also to continue the fame and renown of our former noble fernice, which we wan at the journeys of Marathon and of Salamina: to the end, the world should not thinke that the glory of these triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto Fortune, but vnto the courage and worthinesse of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to change the order of their battell in haft. The THEBANS on the other fide that tooke part with Mardonius, receiving intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes, they straightfold Mardonins of the the ofir. He thereupon did suddenly also change the order of his battell, and placed the right wing bans, of the Persians against the left wing of his enemies: either because he was affraid of the A-THENIANS, or elle for greater glory that he had a defire to fight with the LACED EMONI. ANS, and commanded the GRECIANS that tooke his part, that they should fight against the ATHERIANS. This alteration was fo openly done, that every man might fee it: whereupon Paulanias removed the LACEDEMONIAN'S againe, and fet them inthe right wing. Mardonius feeing that, removed the PERSIANS againe from the right wing, and brought them to the left wing (where they were before) against the LACED EMONIANS: and thusthey consumed all that day in changing their men too and fro. So the captaines of the Grecians fate in counfell at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remove their campe, and lodge in some other place where they might have water at commandement: because their enemies did contimually trouble and spoile that water they had about them, with their horses. Now when night came, the captaines would have marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keepe them together. For they were no fooner out of the trenches & fortifications of their campe, but the most part of them ran to the city of Plat Es, and were maruelloufly out of order, dispersing themfelues here and there, and fet up their tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them : and there were none that taried behind, but the LACED #MONTANS onely, and that was against their wils : for one of their captaines called Amompharetus, a maruellous The stub hardie man, that feared no danger, and longed fore for battell, he was in fuch a rage with these of Among trifling delayes that he cryed it out in the camp, that this remouing was a goodly running away, thateur and fware he would not from thence, but would there tary Mardonius coming with his com- Captaine of pany. Paufanius went to him, and told him he must do that the other GRECIAN'S had consented demonstrate to in counfell, by most voices. But Amompharetus tooke a great stone in his hands, and threw it downe at Paulanias feete, and told him, There is the figne I giue to conclude battell, and I passe not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubburnnesse did so amaze Pausanias, that he was at his wits end. So he fent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might go together, and therwithall made the rest of his men to march towards the city of PLATEES, Supposing thereby to have drawne Amompharetus to have followed him, or else to let him remaine alone behind. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius understanding that the GRECIANS did for sake their first lodging, he made his The batted army presently march in battell ray to set vpon the Laced Amonians. So the barbarous peo. of the Greple made great shoutes and cries, northinking to go fight, but to sacke and spoilethe GRECI- the Perst. Ans flying away, as indeed they did little better. For, Paufanias feeing the countenance of his e- ans, at the nemies, made his enfignes to ftay, and commanded every man to prepare to fight; but he for- sity of Place gate to give the GRECIAN's the fignall of the battell, either for the anger he took against Amompharetus, or for the sudden onset of the enemies, which made them that they came not instraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begun, but stragling in small companies, some here, and fomethere. In the meane time, Paulanias was busie in facrificing to the gods, and seeing that the first facrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothfayers observations they made, he commanded the Spartans to throw their targets at their feete, and not to stirre out of their places, but onely to do as he bade them, without refifting their enemies. When he were at hand, and that their arrowes flew amongst the thickest of the LACED EMONIANS, and did hurt diuerse of them, & specially poore Callicrates among the rest, that was one of the good-Haise with lieft men in all the GRECIAN'S hoaft and army. He having his deaths wound with an arrow, con fighties before he gaue up the ghost, said, His death did not grieue him, because he came out of his country to die for the defence of GRECE: but it grieued him to die fo cowardly, having given the enemy neuer a blow. His death was maruellous lamentable, and the constancie of the Spar. TANS wonderfull: for they neuer flirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themselues against their enemies that came vpon them, but suffered theselues to be thrust tan soldi. through with arrowes, and slaine in the field, looking for the houre the gods would appoint them, and that their captaines would command them to fight. Some write also, that as Pausanias was at his prayers, and doing facrifice vnto the gods a litle behind the battel, certaine of the Ly-DIAN'S came vpon him, and ouerthrew and tooke away all his facrifice; and that Pansanias, and those that were about him (hauing no other weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of staues and whips. In memory whereof, they say there is a solemne procession kept at Sparta on that day, which they call the Lydian's procession, where they whip and beate yong boyes about the altar. Then was Paulanias in great diffresse, to see the priests offer facrisice vpon sacrisice, and that not one of them pleased the gods: at the last he turned his eyes to the temple of Iuno, and wept, and holding vp his hands, befought Iuno Citharon, and all the other gods (patrons and protectours of the country of the PLAT ÆIANS) that if it were not the will of the gods the GRECIANS should have the victory yet that the conquerors at the least should buy their deaths dearely and that they should find they fought against valiant men and worthy fouldiers, Paulanias had no fooner ended his prayer, but the facrifices fell out very fauourable, in so much as the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gaue commandement to march toward the enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently that they should march. So as he that had seene the squadron of the LACED EMONI-ANS, would have faid it had bene like the body of a fierce beaft raifing vp the briftles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people saw they should have hot battell, and that they should meete withmen that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they couered their bodies with great targets after the Persian fashion, & bestowed their arrowes lustily vpon the Lacebe-MONIANS, but they keeping close together, and couering themselues with their shields, marched on still vponthem, vntil they came to joyne with the enemy so lustily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thrusts and blowes of the pikes & speares vpon their breasts, & ouerhwart their faces, that they sue many of them, & laid them on the ground. For all that, they died not cowardly, but tooke the LACED EMONIANS pikes & speares in their bare hands, and breake them in two by strength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt our their cimiters and axes, and luftily laid about them, and wrung the LACED EMONIANS shields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now whilest the Laced Amonians were bufily fighting with the barbarous people, the Atheni-ANS flood fill imbattelled farre off, and kept their ground. But when they faw the LACED EMO. NIANS tary folong, and that they came not, & heard a maruellous noise of men as though they were fighting, and besides that there came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Pausanias, to let them vnderstand they were fighting: then they marched with all speed they could to helpe them. But as they were coming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noise, the Greenan that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loud as he could for life, and conjured the GRECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GRECE, to leaue off thele warres, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe them that ventured their liues, to defend the commonwealth and fafety of all GRECE. But when he faw they would needs fight for any request and conjuration he could vie, and that they came stil vpon them, bending themselves to give charge; then he stayed his going to relieue the LACEDE-MONIANS, and was compelled to make head against those that set vpon him & his company, they being about fifty thousand men; of the which, the most part notwithstanding went their waies, and left the army specially when they understood the Persians were ouerthrown and fled. The furie of the battell and cruellest fight (as they fay) was where the THEBANS were: because the Nobility & chiefest men of the country fought very earnestly for the Persians, but the people refused, being led by a smal number of the Nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACED EMONIANS being the first that ouerthrew y Persian's, and made them flie: & they flue Mardonius the kings lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Mardonius Arimnessus Spartan gauchim vpon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiaraus had prophe Arimnessus cied before vnto him. For Mardonius before the battell had sent thither a Lydian, & a Cari- a Spartan AN vnto the Oracle of Throphonius, of the which the prophet made answervnto y Carian, in with above the CARIAN tongue: and the man of Lydia lay within the fanctuary of Amphiaraus, where he thought in his dream that one of the priests of the temple willed him to go out of the place he was in and he denying it, the priest took a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was flaine with the blow. And thus it is written. And furthermore; the LACED EMONIANS did chase the Persians slying into their fortifications they had in a wood: and the Athenio ANS also shortly after ouerthrew the THEBANS, whereof they slue in the field three hundred of the noblest and chiefest of them. For euen as the Theban's began to turne taile, newes came vnto the Athenians, that the Persians had intrenched these lues within their fort & strength in the wood, where the LACED EMONIANS did befrege them. The ATHENIANS suffered the GRECIANS that fled to faue them selues, and they went to helpe the LACED EMONIANS, to take the fort of the barbarous people: who went before but flenderly about it, because they hadno experience to make an affault, nor force vpon a wall. But fo foone as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they straight tooke it by affault, and made great slaughter of the Persians and barbarous people. For of three hundred thousand fighting men that Mardonius had in his campe, there were faued onely but forty thousand led vider Artabazus; and of the Greetans side there were not slaine about thirteene hundred and threescore in all; amongst which also there were threeses the state of the st two and fiftic Athenians, all of the tribe of Antides, the which had done more valiantly that day, then any other tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the Aantides made a solemne facrifice vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order Athousand ginen them by the Oracle of Apollo, to give them thankes for this victorie. Of the Lac ED #-MONIANS there died fourescore and eleven: and of the TEGEATES fixteene. But I marvell Heterore rodotus faith, that none but these people onely fought in that iourney against the barbarous nation, and no other GRECIANS besides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graues also do shew that it was a generall victory and exploit of all the GRECIANS together. And moreouer, if there had bene but these three people onely that had fought against them, and that all the reft had ftood and looked on, and done nothing: fure there had bene no fuch Epigram as this, engrauen vpon the altar or tombe that was fet vp in the place of the battell:

When the victorious Greekes, had driven out of their land The Persians by force of armes, which long did them withstand, They built to mighty Ioue, this holy altar here, And made it common for all Greece, as plainely may appeare, In guerdon of the good, which he did them restore,

In guerdon of their liberty, which lik'd them euermore. This battell was fought the fourth day of the moneth which the ATHENIAN'S call Badromion, that is, about the moneth of July, or after the Boeotians account, the fixe and twentieth of the moneth they call Panemus, on which day there is kept a common affembly of the estates of GRECE, in the citie of PLATEES, where the PLATEIANS make a solemne sacrifice vnto Inpiter, protectour of their liberty, to give him thankes alwayes for this victory. It is no maruell that there was fuch difference then betwixt the moneths and dayes, confidering that even now when Aftronomie is more perfectly vnderstood then it was then, some do yet beginne and end their moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great battell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there arofe a great strife betwixt the Athenians and the Laced E.

Monians, touching the reward and honour of the victorie. For the Athenians would be the stripe of the stri not gine place vnto the Laced Emonians, nor suffer them to set vp any tokens or signes distensions and Local of triumph. Whereupon the Grecians running to armes in mutinie together, by this occafion they had almost spoiled one another; had not Arifides through his wisdome and wise per-Iwasions, staied and quieted the other captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates of the viand Myronides, whom he wan with fuch different and gentle words, that they were contented thrie.

to referre it wholly vuto the arbiterment and judgement of the other people of GRECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuerses. In this councell holden there, Theogiton a captaine of the MEGARIANS, faid for his opinion, that to auoide the civill warre might grow betweene the Grecians vpon this quartell: he thought it more requifite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victory vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus Corinthian, seeming to every manthere that he would have requested this honour for the citie of CORINTH, being indeed the third city in estimation of all Grece, vnto Sparta and Athens: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLAT EIANS, which was maruellously liked, and well thought of by every man: for his opinion went flatly with the PLATEIANS, that to end this strife, they should give the honour of this victory vnto the city of Plat Els, and fo would neither of both parties be angry that they should be honoured. Vpon his words Aristides first agreed on the Athenians behalfe, and then Pausamas for the Laced Emo-NIANS, That the PLAT ÆIANS should have the reward. Now they both being agreed, before the spoile was divided betweenethem, they setaside fourescore talents that were given to the PLATEIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and set out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACED Æ-MONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victorie by themselnes, and the A-THENIAN'S theirs also by themselves. So they sending vnto the Oracle of Apollo in the citie of Delphes, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do facrifice: Apollo answered them that, they should build vp an altar vnto Iupiter, protectour of their liberty; howbeit that they should put no facrifice vponit, vntill they had first put out all the fire through the whole country, because it had bene pollured and defiled by the barbarous people; and then, that they should fetch pure and cleane fire at the common altar, whereon they do sacrifice vnto A. pollo Pythias, in the citie of Delphes. This answer being delinered, the great Lords and officers of GRECE went through all the countrey to put out the fire euery where. And there was a man of the same city of PLATÆE's at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered himselfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speed that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of Jaurell vpon his head, and went inthat manner to take fire from the altar of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as fast as he could runne for life, vnto the city of PLATÆES, and came thither before the Sunne was fet, having come & gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought, he fell downe dead at their feet, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATEIAN'S lift him vp starke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Enclia, to say, of good renowne: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

Engraved heere doth lye, Enchidas speedy mans Who in one day both too and fro, to Delphes lightly ranne? Euenfrom this felfe same place, which thou doest here behold, Such haste, post haste, be swiftly made, thereof thou maist be bold.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the daughter of Hercules, and Myrto the Nymph Menatius daughter, and Patroclus fifter, that died a virgin, and was honored afterwards as a goddesse of the Bobotians, and of the LOCRIANS. For inali their cities and townes in open places, they finde an altar and image dedicated vnto her : and all that are maried, do facrifice to her vpon that altar. Afterwards there A General Was a generall councell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Ariffides made a mo-A Grandal tion, that all the cities of GRECE should yearely send their deputies at a certaine day appointments. ted, vnto the citie of Plat EEs, there to make their prayers and facrifices vnto the gods: and that from flue yeares, to flue yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of liberty and that they shold also leavie through all the provinces of GRECE, for maintenance of the warres against the Persians and barbarous people, ten thousand footemen, athousand horsemen, and a fleere of an hundred saile. Also that the PLAT ÆIANS thenceforth should be taken for deuout and holy men, and that no man should be so hardy as to hurt or offend them; and that they should onely tend the factifices vnto the gods, for the health and prosperity of GRECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforefaid and the PLAT ELAN'S bound themselves yearely to keep solemne sacrifices and aniversaries Solemne for the foules of the Grecians that were flaine in their teritories, fighting for defence of facilities tor the following of the GRECIANS that were name in their criticities, inguiting to the fixteenth and funer the liberty of the GRECIANS. And this they observe yet vnto this day in this fort. The fixteenth day of the moneth of Mamacterion (which the Bo E OTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuary) they go a procession, and before the procession goeth a trumpetter that any yearsly month of rangery they go a processor, and before the processor grant by for the foundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre-tree, and Grecians with no fegaves and garlands of triumph: then a blacke bull, and certaine yong gentlemen noble shat were men sonnes, that cary great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, such as they vseto state at powre vpon the graues of dead men for propitiatory oblations; and other yong boyes free the battell borne, that carry oiles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in viall glasses: for no seruant or bondman may lawfully be admitted to have any office about this mystery, for that they whose memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the liberty of GRECE. After all this shew, followeth the prouost of the PLAT EIANS for that time being, last of all; who may not al the rest of the yeare besides so much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall pot in one of his hands, which he taketh in the towne-house, and a naked sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the city in this fort after all the pompe aforesaid, vnto the Church-yard where all their graues be that were flaine at that battell. So when he cometh thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the four esquare pillars and images that stand vpon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oyles and sweete sauours: afterwards, he facrificeth a bull, and layeth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men; and making certaine prayers and petitions vnto Iupiter and Mercurie, gods of the earth, he doth folemnly inuite the foules of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberty of GRECE, vnto the feaft of the funerall facrifice. Then he taking a cup full of wine in his hand, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these words aloud: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in desence of the liberty of GRECE. This folemne ceremony and aniuerfarie, the Plat Elans do duely observe vnto this present day. Now whenthe ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceiuing the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authority, judging them well worthy to be confidered of, in respect of their noble service and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: and confidering also that they would hardly be Arifides brought to like of any other gouernement, being yet in armes, and very frout, by reason of the famous victories they had obtained: he caused a law to be made, that all authority of gouernement should runne in equality among the citizens, and that then ce foorth all burgesses (as well A wirked poore as rich) should be chosen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the city. And moreouer, when Themistocles told in open affembly, that he had athing in his head eles. would be greatly to the profit and commodity of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diverse respects: the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduice in it, to know whether it was meete to be done, or not. Then Themistocles told him secretly misseles betweene them, that he thought to fet the arcenall on fire, where all the GRECIANS flips lay: alledging, that by this meanes the Athenians shold be the greatest me of power in al Grece. of the A-Ariflides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and told the theniam. whole councell openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeed for the whole commonwealth, and withall more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. generals of When the people heard Aristides answer, they willed Themistocles to let his deuice alone the Atherina ans against what soeuer it were: so great insticers were the Athenians, and so much did they trust A. the barbas ristides wisdome and equity besides. So they made Aristides afterwards Generall of the armie rous people. of the Athenians together with Cimon, and fent them to make warre against the barba-inflice and rous people. Arifides at his coming thither, feeing Paulanias, and the other captaines that were verius

Arifides

LACED EMONIANS in GRECE, notby force of armes, nor by ships, not by numbers of horses, but onely by his graue and wife gouernment. For if the iustice and vertue of Aristides, and the mildnesse and curtesse of Cimon made the government of the ATHENIANS to be liked of and accepted of althe other people of GRECE: the conctonfiesse, pride and siercenesse of Paulanias, made it much more to be defired. For Paufanias neuer spake vnto the other captaines of the people, allies, and confederates, but it was ever in choler, and he was too fharpe with them: and for the poore private fouldiers, he would cause them to be cruelly whipped for every small offence, or else make them stand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heavy iron anker vpontheir shoulders. No man durst goe forrage, neither for straw, norrecdes to make them couches of, nor durst water their horse before the Spartans: for he had set skouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Arifides thought to have spoken to him, and to haue told him something, he frowned upon him: and said he had no leyfureto speake with him now, and so would not heare him: whereupon the captaines of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, & of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Aria fides, and perswaded him to take voon him the charge & authority to command the other people of GRECE, and to take into his protection the allies and confederates of the fame, who long fithens wished to reuolt from the gouernement of the LACED EMONIANS, and onely to submit themselues vnto the Athenians. Aresides answered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they said, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the Athenians might have good ground and assurance of their vindoubted fidelity and good service, they should deliver them manifest testimony and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACED EMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst nouer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, and Aniagoras of CHIO hearing imm aft of him fay fo, both captaines of galleys confedered together they wet one day to fet vpon the Admirall galley of Paufanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one fide of her, and the other on datagoras datagoras the other fide, as fine was rowing before all the fleete. Pansanias feeing them, flood vp flraight in Eansanias. a maruellous rage against them, & threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to have affaulted their owne naturall country, then to have serveon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bad him get him away quickly if he were wife, and let him thanke Fortune hardly, that granted the GRECIANS victory at the battell of PLATÆE'S vnder his leading: and that it was nothing else but the onely reuerence and respect of the fame, that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now, from giving him that inft punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserved. So the end was, they left the LACED EMONI-ANS, and stucke vnto the ATHENTANS: wherein was easily discerned the great courage and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACED EMONIANS. For when they faw their captaines were ratice of the marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement ouer the other GRECTANS, and did no more fend their captaines to be Generals of the whole army of GRECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they shold be obedient, and in enery point observe the discipline and law of their country, then if they had bene otherwise the onely rulers and Lords over the whole country. Now at what time the LA-CED EMONIANS did commandall GRECE, as Lords, the cities and people of GRECE did pay a certaine fum of money, towards defraying of the charges of the warres against the barbarous people. But after that their feigniority and rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented ataxe should be leauied, and that every city should be reasonably sessed, according to their wealth and ability:because every city might know what they should pay. And for this purpose, they prayed the ATHENIANS they wold appoint Aristides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power and authority to taxe and fesse enery city indifferently, considering the greatnes of the territory, & the reuenues of the same, as every one was reasonably able to beare it. But if Ariftides were poore when heentred into that great charge & office of authority, wherein all GRECE in maner did refer themselves vnto his discretion: he came out of that office more poore, and had made his affestement and taxation not onely justly and truly, but also so indifferently according vnto eucry mans ability, that there was no man could find fault with his doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate and fing out the bleffednesse of those that lived vnder the reigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: even so did the people and confederates of the ATHENIAN'S afterwards honour the affeffement made by Arifides calling it the fortunat & bleffed time of GRECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sudden. For the taxe Aristides made, came to about source hundred and threefcoretalents: and Pericles raised it almost vnto a third part. For Thusydides writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of Peloponnesus, the Athenians leavied fixe hundred talents vearely vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the oratouts & counsellors for matters of state, did raise it vp higher by little and litle, vntill it mounted to the summe of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not because the warres did rise to so great a charge, by reafon of the length of the fame, and of the losses the ATHENIANS had received; but for that they did accustome the people to make distributions of money by hand vnto every citizen, to make them fet vp games, and make goodly images, and to build vp sumpruous temples. Thus was Arithides therefore inftly honored, praised and esteemed about all others, for this inst imposition of taxes, faning onely of Themistocles: who went vp and downe fleering at the matter, saying it was nomeete praise for an honest man, but rather for a coffer well barred with iron, where a man might fafely lay vp his gold & filuer. This he spake to be euen with Aristides, which was nothing twins the like the sharpe gird Aristides gaue him openly, when Themistocles talking with him, told him it misseles was an excellent thing for a captaine to be able to know, and to present the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels and doings and Aristides are supported by the counsels are sup of the enemies: And so it is, faid Arifiides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honest thing, and meete for a worthy Generall of an army, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Arifides made all the other people of GRECE to sweare, that they would truly keepe the articles of the alliance, and he himselfe as Generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their oaths in the name of the Athenians: and so pronouncing execrations and curses against them that should breake the league and oath taken, he threw iron wedges red hot into the fea, and prayed the gods to destroy them even so, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithstanding, afterwards (in my opinion) when there fell out great alteration in the state, and that the ATHENIANS were forced torule more straightly then before: Aristides then willed the ATHENIANS to let him beare the danger & burthen of periury and execration, and that they should not let for fearetherof to do any thing whatfoeuer they thought meete or necessary. To conclude, Theophrastus writeth, that Anilides was not onely a perfect, an honest, and inst man, in private matters betwirt party and party: but in matters of state, and concerning the commonweale, he did many things oftentimes according to the necessity of the time; and troubles of the city, wherein violence and iniuflice was to be vied. As when the question was asked in open councell, to know whether they professed might take away the gold & filuer, that was left in the Ile of DELOS fafely laid vp in the temple necessities of Apollo, to beare out the charges of the warres against the barbarous people, and to bring it fro thence vnto ATHENS, vpo the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the ar- redon. ticles of the alliance, made and fworne among all the GRECIANS; Aristides opinion being afked in the same, he answered: it was not iust, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his city to rule and command many thousands of people, yet was he still poore for all that, and till his dying day he gloried rather to be praifed for his pouerty, then for all the fa- Arifides all that, and the his dying day negioned rather to be practed for the policy mous victories & battels he had won and that plainly appeared thus. Callias Geres torch-bearer, gland in mous victories & battels he had won and that plainly appeared thus. Callias Geres torch-bearer, gland in hazard of life to hippurity. was his neare kinsman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life; so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Judges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vitered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other bymatters, left the chiefe matter, and spake thus to the Judgesmy Lords, you all know Arifides the son of Lysimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his vertue hath made him more estecmed, then any man else is or can be, in all GRECE. How thinkeye doth he live at home, when you're him abroad vp and downe the city, in a threed-bare gowne all to be tattered. Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all see quake for very cold, being fo ill arraied and clothed? And yet M. Callias here his cofin germaine the richest citizen in all ATHENS, is so miserable, that notwithstanding Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authority among you, he suffered him and his poore wife & children ready to beg & starue for any helpe he gineth him. Callian perceiving the Judges more angry with him for that, then for any matter else he was accused of : he prayed Artifides might be fent for, and willed him to tell truly whether he had not offered him good round fums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it; which he euer refused, and answered him alwayes, That he could better boast of his pouerty, then himselfe could of his riches

(which he faid many did vie ill, and few could vie them well) and that it was a hard thingto find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pouerty, and that fuch onely might be ashamed of poucrty, as were poore against their wils. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: & euery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is writtethus by Assiming the Bocratian philosopher: & Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstanding there were many other famous and noble men of Athens, yet he gaue Arifides praise about them all. For others, said he, (as Themisticcles, Cimon, and Pericles) have beautified the city with stately porches, & sumptuous buildings of gold and silver, and with store of other sine superfluous devices: but Arifides, was onely he, that vertuously disposed himselfe and all his doings, to the furtherance of the state and common weale. His inflice and good nature appeared plainly in his doings, and behaviour to-wards Themisfocles. For though Themisfocles was ever against Aristides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practife he was banished from Athens: yet when Themistocles was accused of treason to the state, having diverse sharpe enemies against him, as Cimon, Alemeon, with diverse other, Aristides sought not revenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioyee to see his enemie in misery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his prosperity. And touching Ariftides death, fome write that he died in the realme of Pont's, being fent thither about matters of the state: and other thinke he died an old man in the citie of A-THENS, greatly honoured and beloued of all the citizens. But Craterus the Macedonian writeth of his death in this fort: After that Themistocles (faith he) was fled, the people of ATHEN's became very stubburne and insolents wher upon, many lewd men grew to be comen appeachers and accusers of the noble men and chiefest citizens, and to stirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the rest, Aristides was condemned for extortion and ill behauiour in the common wealth, vpon one Diophantes accufation, of the village of Amphitrope: who burthened him, that he tooke money of the Ionians, to make the annual tribute cesse which they payed vnto Athens: and so Craterus faith, that because Aristides was not able to pay the fine they set vpo his head (which was flue Minas) he was driuento for sake ATHENS, &to gethim into Ionia, where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he write that his pleading, his sentence and condemnation, or any decree passions of the sentence and condemnation are the sentence a fed against him, although he vsed great diligence else in collecting all such matters, and vouching his authors. Furthermore, all other writers that have specially noted the faults & offences committed by the people of Athens in former times against their captaines and governours: they do declare Themistocles exile, Militades captinity that died in prison, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that flue himselfe in the pulpit for orations, when he saw he was condemned: and tell diuerse such stories, adding too also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no matter of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of Moreouer, Aristides tombe is to be seene atthis day vpon the hauen of PHALERVS, which was set vp for him at the charge of y common wealth, as it is reported, because he died so poore a man, as they found nothing in his house to bury him with. Other go surther, and say that his daughters were maried mai thank by decree of the people, at the charge of the commonwealth, & that the city gaue enery one of them three thousand Drachmas; and his sonne Lystmachus, a hundred Minas of silver, and a hundred Iugera; and at Alcibiades request, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him source. Drachmas a day besides, of ordinary allowance, Furthermore, when this Lysimachus died, he lest aliue one onely daughter called Polycrite, whom the people appointed, as Callifthenes writeth, as much prouifion to liue withal, as they gaue to any that wanthe Olympian games. And fithence, Demetrius Phalerian, Hyeronimus Rhodian, Aristoxenus the Musician, and Aristotlethe Philosopher, at the least if the booke intituled of Nobility be any of Aristotles works: all these agree together, that one Myrto, Aristides daughters daughter, was maried to the wise Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) because she was a poore widow, and could not be maried for her pouerty, having much ado to line. Yet Panatius doth write against him, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN Writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well he had scene one Lysimachus, Aristides sonnes sonne, or his daughters sonne, that was very poore, and lined of that he could get to interprete dreames, by certaine tables, wherein was written the artto interprete the fignification of dreames; and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his mother and his sister, he said he had caused the people to give them a Triobulum apeece, euery day towards their liuing. It is very true that the selfe same Demetrius Phalerian, when he reformed the state of Athens, ordained that his mother and sister should have each of thema Drachma by the day to find them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new nor ftrange thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe and to relieue the The Atherne women that dwelt in the city: confidering that in times past, Aristogiton having a litle daughter in the Ile of Lemnos, in very hard and poore estate, and that could not be bestowed in mariage this liberation. for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to Athens, and maried her in one of the noblest houses of the city, & made her a joynter besides in the village of Potamos. Which great courtesseand humanity of theirs, bath euer deserved great same and commendation, and yet continueth euenvntill this day, in that noble city of Athens, in the mouth of euery manthere.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Cato the Censor.

ARCPS Cato and his ancestors, were (as they fay) of the city of THV s-CVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and liued in the countrey of the Sa-BYNES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And thoughto many his ancestors were knowne to haue bene obscure: yet he himselfe did his ancestors were knowne to haue belief oblicing. Yet he his ham, and fay-highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, and faying he was a fouldier, and had ferued valiantly in the field. And he relief halfo of another Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valiant feruice had bene of trewarded of the Generals, with such honorable gifts, as the Romaines did vie to give vnto them that had done some famous act in any battell; and how that he having lost five horses of service in the warres, the value of the same was restored to him againe in mony of the common treasure, because he had shewed himselse trufty and valiant for the common wealth. And where they had a common speech at Rome, to call them vpffarts that were no gentlemen borne, but did rife by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be case called called one of them. And for his part he did confesse it, that he was the first of his house that an opsiare.

euer had honour, and office of state; but by reason of the noble acts and good service of his ancestors, he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priscus: but afterwards by reason of his great wisedome and experience, he was surnamed Cato, because the Romain es call a wise man, and him that hath seene much, Cato. He was somewhat giuen to be red-faced, and had a paire of staring eyes in his head, as this mantelleth vs., that for ill will wrote these verses of him after his death:

Pluto (the god) which rules the Furies infernall. Will not receive the damned chost, of Porcius in his hall. His fawcy coppered no le, and fierie staring eyes, His common flanderous tales, which be did in this world deuife, Made Pluto stand in dread, that he would brawle in hell,

This Ma-Cato the elder wondered at thethrifet. neffe of Manista

Although his bones were drie and dead; on earth he was so fell. Furthermore touching the disposition of his body, he was maruellous strong and lustic, and all because he did vsc to labour and toile even from his youth, and live sparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the warres from his youth; fo that he was of a very good constitution, both for strength of body, and for health. As for vtterance, he esteemed it as a second body, and most necessary gift, not only to make men honest, but also as a thing very requisit for a man that should beare sway and authority in the common wealth. He practised to speake well in little villages neare home, whither he went many times to pleade mens causes in courts judiciall, that would retain him of counfell: fo as in short time he became a perfect pleader, and had tongue cate an ex- at will, and in processe of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well known, they cellent ora- that were familiar with him, began to perceive a grave manner and behaviour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of state and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not onely refuse to take fees for his pleading, and following the causes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the estimation he wan by that manner and practife, as though that was not the onely marke he shot at-But his defire reached further, rather to win himfelfe fame by feruice in the warres, and by valiant fighting with his enemy, then with fuch a quiet and pleafing manner of life. Infomuch as when he was but a young stripling in manner, he had many cuts vpon his breast, which he had received in diverse battels and encounters against the enemies. For he himselfe writeth, that he was but feuenteene yeares old, when he went first vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe prosperity, when he spoiled and destroyed all ITALY. So when he came to fight he would ftrike luftily, and neuer ftirre foote nor give backe; and would looke cruelly you his enemic, and threaten him with a fearefull and terrible voice, which he vied himfelf, and wifely taught other alfo to vse the like for such countenances, said he, many times do feare the enemies more then the fword ye offer them. When he went any journey, he euer marched on foote, and caried his armor vpon his backe & had a man waiting on him that caried his victuals with him with whom he was neuer angry (as they fay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or fupper, but did helpe to dreffe it himselfe for the most part, if he had any leisure, when he had done the dutie of a private souldier in fortifying the campe, or such other needfull businesse. All the while he was abroad inferuice in the wars, he never dranke other then cleane water, vnleffe it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a little vineger; but if he faw he nius cusius were weake, he wold then drink a litle wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Curius the ROMAINE who had triumphed thrife, had a prety house & land hard by Cato, where he kept in times past. being Gone. Which Cate for a while would visite oft. And he confidering how little land he had to his house. & what a litle house he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondred with himselfe what manner of man Curius had bene, that having bene the greatest man of Rome in his time, and hauing subdued the mightiest nations and people of all ITALY, and driven king Pyrrus also out of the same: yet himself with his owne hands did manure that litle parch of ground, and dwell in so poore & small a farme. Whither notwithstanding after his three triumphs, the SAMNITES sent their Ambassadors to visite him, who found him by the fires side seething of parseneps, and presented him a maruellous deale of gold, from their state and communalty. But Curius returned them again with their gold, and told them, that fuch as were contented with that supper, had no need of gold nor filuer; and that for his part, he thought it greater honor to command them that had gold, then to have it himselfe. Cato remembring these things to himselfe, went home againe, and began to think evpon his house, of his living, of his family and servants, and also of his expences, and to cut off all superfluous charges, and fell himselfe to labour with his owne hands, morethen euer he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTYM againe; Cato served vnder him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the Pythagorian Philosopher, in whom he took maruellous de- Nearthus light to heare him talke of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that the Pytha-Plate did, by calling him the sweete poyson and chiefest baite to allure men to ill: and saying that Phylosothe body was the first plague vnto the foule, and that her onely health, remedic, and purgation pher, carees stood vpon rules of reason; good examples and contemplations; that drive sinfull thoughts and carnall pleasures of the body, farre off from her. Cato moreouer gaue himselfe much to sobriety and temperance, and framed himselfero becomen with litle. They say he fell in his very old stature. age to the studie, of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited somewhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his matter, and also to be eloquent: ned the which plainly appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, and flories taken out of the Greeke authors: and many of his sentences and morals. his adages and quicke bioldage. answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a noble man of Rome at Cato press. that time, one of great authority, & a deepe wife man befides, who could eafily discerne buds of by Demovertue sprouting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable disposition to themselves helpe forward, and to aduance fuch; his name was Valerius Flaccus, a neere neighbour vnto Cato, quence. who was informed by his feruants of Catoes strange life, how he would be doing in his ground Flacewa with his owne hands: and how he would be gone every day betimes in the morning to little vil. grave wife lagesthereabours, to pleade mens causes that prayed his counsell, and that when he had done he would come home againe: & if it were in Winter, that he would but cast a litle coat on his shoulders and being Sommer he wold go out bare-necked to the wast, to work in his ground among his servants and other workmen: and would besides, sit & eate with them together at one boord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him also a world of such maners and fashions he vfed, that shewed him to be a maruellous plaine man, without pride, & of a good nature. The they told him what notable wife fayings and grave fentences they heard him fpeake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiting he was of a very good nature, and well given, and that he was a good graffe to be fet in a better ground, he perswaded him to come to Rom B, and to practife there in the affembly of the people, in the common causes and affaires of the comonweale. Cate followed his counfell, who having bin no long practifer among them, did grow cate goods. straight into great estimation, and wan him many friends, by reason of the causes he tooke in to Rome by hand to defend and was the better preferred and taken allo, by meanes of the special fauour and Flatter countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For first of all, by voice of the people he was chosen Tribune of the fouldiers (to fay, colonell of a thouland footmen) & afterwards was made treasurer: Catachofes and so went forwards, and grew to so great credite and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus williams. companion in the chiefest offices of state, being chosen Consult with him, and then Censor. But cateer of to begin withall, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of Rome, Senate. and gaue himselfe to follow him altogether; and not so much for the credit & estimation Fabius catefalism Maximus was of (who therein excelled all the ROMAINES of that time) as for the modely and ed Fabins discreet gouernment he saw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour &example. At which time Cato patfed not for the malice and cuill will of Scipio the Great, who did Catossemus ftriue atthat present being but a yong man, with the authority and greatnes of Fabius Maximus, lation with as one that seemed to enuy his rising & greatnesse. For Cato being sent treasurer with Scipio, when Great. he vindertook the journy into A FRICKE, and perceiving Scipioes bountiful nature, & disposition to large gifts without meane to the fouldiers: he told him plainely one day, that he did not fo cate being much hurt the commonwealth in wasting their treasure; as he did great harme in changing the treasures. ancient manner of their aunceftours: who yied their fouldiers to be contented with litle, but he raught them to fpend their superfluous mony (al necessaries prouided for) in vaine toies & trifles ean, reproto serue their pleasure. Scipio made him answer he would have no treasurer should controll him und him in this fort, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the for his wars, with full failes as it were, and that he would (and did also determine) to make the state prinieto all his doings, but not to the mony he spent. Cate hearing this answer, returned with speed out of Sicile vnto Rome, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio fpent infinitely, and that he tended playes, comedies, and wreftlings, as if he had not bene sent to make warres, inuafions, and attempts vpon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to go and see if their informations were true: and sinding them fo, that they should bring him backe againe to Rome. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparent victory, through the necessary preparation and provision he had made for the warres; and he confessed also, that when he had difpatched his great bufinesse, and was at any leasure, he would be prinately merrie with his friends: and though he was liberall to his fouldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his dutie and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipio tooke shipping, and failed towards Africke, whither he was sent to make warre. Now to returne to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by meanes of his eloquence, so that diverse called him the Demosthenes of Rome: howbeit the manner of his life was in more estimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of Rome did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one enuied another which of them should come nearest: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their forefathers did, & made a light supper and dinner without fire or prouision, or would be content with a meane gown, and a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honourable to defie fancies and pleasures, then to have and enjoy them. Because the state was waxen now of such power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the ancient discipline, and former austerity & straightnesse of lifeit vsedibut by reason of the largenesse of their dominion and feigniority, & the numbers of people and nations that were become their subjects, it was even forced to receive a medley of fundry countrey fashions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason mendid so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with paines and labour tenderly brought vp like pulers; and Cato on the other fide neuer onercome, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor, nor in his age also when he was gray headed and bald, after his Consulship and triumph: but like a conquerour that had gotten the maistery, he would neuer giue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he writeth himselfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backethat cost him aboue 100 pence, and that his hinds and workemen alwayes drunke no worfe wine, when he was Confull and Generall of the army, then he did himselfe: and that his cater neuer bestowed in meate for his supper, aboue thirty Asses of Romains money; and yet he said it was, because he might be the stronger, and apter to do service in the wars for his country & the common wealth. He said furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapeftry by him with a deepe border, which they called them the BABYLONIAN border, and he caused it straight to be fold; and that of all his houses he had abroad in the country, he had not one wall plastered. nor rough cast. Moreouer he would say, he neuer bought bondman or slaue dearer, then a thoufand five hundred pence, as one that fought not for fine made men and goodly personages, but firong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horse-keepers, neat-heards, & such like: and againe he would fell them when they were old, because he would not keepe them when they could do no service. To conclude, he was of opinion, that a man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpose; yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to beflow so litle, for that which needed not. He wold have men purchase houses, that had more store of arable land and pasture, the of fine hortyards or gardens. Some fay, he did thus for very mise-Gentlevesse ry and couctous fields their thinke, and tooke it that he lived so sparingly, to move others by his example to cut off all superfluity and waste. Neuerthelesse, to sell slaues in that sort, or to turne them out of doores when you have had the service of all their youth, & that they are grown old, Gentleneffe as you vie brute beaftes that have served whilest they may for age: me thinkes that must needes proceed of too seuere and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or consideratio of humanity, then whilest one is able to do another good. For we see, gentlenesse goeth further then iustice. For nature teachethys to vse instice onely to them, but gentlenesse sometimes is shewed vnto bruite beafts: and that cometh from the very fountaine and spring of all courtesseand humanity, which should neuer dry vp in any man liuing. For to say truly, to keep cast horses spoiled in our service, and dogs also, not only when they are whelpes, but when they be old, be even tokens of loue and kindnes. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their teple called Hecatompedon: that they should suffer the moyles and mulets that did service in their cariages about about the building of the same, to graze every where, without let or trouble of any man. And they fay there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her felfeto the place to labour, going before all the other draught beafts that drew vp carts loden towards the caffell. and kept them company, as though fhe seemed to encourage the rest to draw: which the people liked fo well in the poore beaft, that they appointed the should be keept whilft she lived, at the charge of the town. And yet at this present are the graves of Cimens mares to be seene, that wan him thrice together the prize of the horse race at the games Olimpian, and they are hard by the graue of Cimon himselfe. We heare of diverse also that had buried their dogsthey brought up in their house, or that waited on them: as among other, old Xanthippus buried his dog in the top of a Xambippus cliste, which is called the dogs pit til this day. For when the people of Athens did for sake their duried his city at the coming downe of the king Xerxes, this dog followed his master, swimming in the sea summed by his galleys fide, from the firme land, vnto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to by his galvie liuing and fensible things, as we would vie an old shoo or a rag, to cast it out vpon the dunghill when we have worn it, and can ferue vs no longer. For if it were for no respect else, but to vse thousto Se. vs alwaies to humanity, we must euer shew our selues kind and gentle, euen in such small points sofpitie. And as for me, I could neuer find in my heart to sell my draught Oxe that had ploughed belanded. my land a long time, because he could plough no longer for age: and much lesse my slaue, to sell him for a little money, out of the countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life, wher with he was best acquainted, & then specially, when he shall be as vnprofitable for the buyer, as also for the feller. But Cato on the other side gloried, that he left his horse in Spaine he had served on in the warres during his Consulship, because he would not put the common wealth to the charge of bringing him home by feainto ITALIE. Now a queffion might be made of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was noblenesse or a niggardlinesse in him:but otherwise to say truly, he was a man of a wonderfull abstinence. For when he was Generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three bushels of wheate cases a moneth of the commonwealth, for himselfe and his whole family and but a bushel and a halfe straight of barly a day, to keepe his horse and other beasts for his cariage. On a time when he was Præ- Cato Pretor, the gouernement of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot: and where the other Prætors be-torinsarforchim had put the countrey to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with tents, bedding, clothes, and fuch like stuffe, and burthened them also with a maruellous traine of servants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expense in feasing and banqueting of them: Cate in contrary manner brought downeall that excelle and superfluitie, vnto a maruellous neare and vncredible fauing. For when he went to vifite the cities, he came on footeto cates them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himselfe: and had onely one officer or bailiffe of the state that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cuppe with him, to offer vp wine in his circumstance. to the gods in his facrifices. But though he came thus fimply to the subjects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed himselfe seuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iu- catter seftice:and spared no man, in any commandement of service for the state, and commimonwealth: for he was therein so precise, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernement, both to loue and feare the Empire of Rome, more then euer they had before as appeareth plainely by the manner both of his spea- career king and writing:because it was pleasant and yet graue: sweete and searcfull:merry and seuere, speed and seurentious and ver samiliar, such as is meete to be speed. And he was to be compared the mining. fententious and yet familiar, such as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared vnto Socrates: who (as Plato faith) at the first fight was a plaine simple manto them that knew him The praise but outwardly, orelfe a pleasant taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and of Suraire, found him throughly, they saw he was full of graue sentences, goodly examples, and wise perfwafions, that he could make men water their plants that heard him, &leade them as he would by the care. Therefore I cannot fee any reason that moues men to say, Cate had Lysias grace and vtterance. Notwithstanding, let vs referre it to their judgements that make profession to discerne Oratours graces and filles: for my part I shall content my selfeto write at this present, only certaine of his notable sayings and sentences, perswading my self that mens maners are better discerned by their words, then by their lookes, and so do many thinke. On a time seeking to diffwade the people of Rome, which would needes make a thankefull distribution of corne vnto enery citizen, to no purpose, he beganne to make an oration with this preface. It is a hard caten say. thing (my Lords of Rome) to bring the belly by perswasions to reason, that hath no cares. ing.

And another time, reprouing the ill gouernment of the city of Rome, he faid: it was a hard thing to keepe vp that state, where a litle fish was fould dearer then an Oxe. He said also that the Ro-MAINES were like a flocke of sheepe for faith he, as every Weather when he is alone, doth not obey the shepheard, but when they are altogether they one follow another for loue of the formost euen so are you for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the noses by fuch, whose counsell not a man alone of you would vie in any private cause of your owne. And talking another time of the authoritie the women of Rome had ouer their husbands, he faid: other men commanded their wives, and we command men, and our wives command vs. But this last of all he borrowed of Themistocles pleasant sayings. For his sonne making him do many things by meanes of his mother, he told his wife one day: The ATHENIANS command all GRECE, I command the ATHENIANS, you command me, and your fonne ruleth you. I prayyoutherefore bid him vse the liberty he hath with some better discretion, soole and asse as he is. fithence he can do more by that power and authoritie, then all the GRECIANS besides. He faid also that the people of Rome did not only delight in diverse forts of purple, but likewise in diverse sort soft exercises. For said he, as diverse comonly die that colour they see best esteemed and is most pleasant to the eye: euen so the lusty youthes of Rome do frame themselves to such exercise, as they see your selues most like and best esteeme. He continually aduised the Ro-MAINES, that if their power and greatnesse came by their vertue and temperance, they should take heed they became no changelings, nor waxe worfe; and if they came to that greatnesse by vice and violence, that then they should change to better, for by that meanes he knew very well they had attained to great honour and dignity. Again he told them, that fuch as fued ambitioufly to beare office in the commonwealth, and were common futers for them, did feeme to be afraid to lose their way, and therefore would be sure to have others and sergeants before them, to flew them the way, left they should lose themselves in the city. He did reproue them also, that often chose one man to continue one office still: for it seemeth, saith he, either that you passe not much for your officers, or that you have not many choice men you think worthy for the office. There was an enemy of his that led a maruellous wicked and an abhominable life, of whom he was wont to fay, that when his mother prayed vnto the gods that she might leaue her sonne behind her, she did not thinke to pray, but to curse: meaning to have him live for a plague to the world. And to another also that had vnthriftily sold his lands which his father had left him, lying vpon the sea side, he pointed vnto them with his finger, & made as though he wondred how he came to be so great a man, that he was stronger then the sea: for that which the sea hardly cofumeth and eateth out by litle and litle a long time, he had confumed it all at a chappe. Another time, when king Eumenes was come to Rome, the Senate entertained him maruellous honourably, and the noblest citizens did striue, enuying one another, who should welcome him best. But Cate in contrary maner shewed plainely, that he did suspect all this feasting and entertainement, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I maruell why you flie from king Eumenes company, that is so good a Prince, and loues the Romains so wel: Yea, said he, let it be so, but for all that, a king is no better then a rauening beast that liues of the prey: neither was there euer any king fo happie, that deserved to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themissocles, nor to Manius Carius, or to Hamylear, surnamed Barca. They say his enemies did malice him, because he vsed commonly to rise before day, and did forget his owne businesse to follow matters of state. And he affirmed that he had rather lose the reward of his well doing, then not to be punished for doing of euill; and that he would be are with all other oftaiorsanta fending ignorantly, but not with himselfe. The Romaines, having chosen on a time three aff foref. Ambaffadors to fend into the Realme of BYTHINIA, one of them having the goute in his feet, the other his head full of curs and great gashes, and the third being but a foole: Cato laughing, fay, roder. faid, the Romains fent an Ambaffade that had neither feet, head nor heart. Scipio fued once to Cate at Polybius request, about those that were banished from Achaia. The matter was argued , afterwards in the Senate, and there fellout diuers opinions about it. Some would have had them restored to their countrey and goods againe : other were wholly against it. So Cato rising vpat the last, said vnto them: It seemes we have little else to do when we stand beating of our braines all day, disputing about these old GRECIANS, whether the ROMAINES OF the ACHA-TANS shall burie them. In the end, the Senate tooke order they should be restored vnto their country againe. Wherupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the

So Cato knew it. But Paccus being affraid to come neare his master, hanged himselse: and then banished men whom they had restored by their order, might enjoy their former estates and honours in Achara, they had at the time of their banishment; but before he would moue the suite unto the Senate, he would feele Catees opinion first, what he thought of it. Who answered him. fmiling: Me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vly fes, that when he had scaped out of Cyclons caue the Giant, he would needs go thither againe, to fetch his hat and girdle he had left behind him there. He faith alfo, that wife men did learne and profit more by fooles, then fooles did by wife men. For wife men faith he, do fee the faults fooles commit, and can wifely avoide them ! but fooles neuer studie to follow the example of wife mens doings. He said also that he ener liked voung men better that blushed, then those that ever looked whitely; and that he would not have Bloghing in him for a fouldier, that wags his hand as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth and rowteth and snorteth louder in his sleepe, then when he cryeth our to his enemie. Another time when he would taunt a maruellous fat man: See, faith he, what good can fuch a body do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly & And to another man that was given to pleasure, and defired to be great with him! My friend faid Cate, as refufing his acquaintance: I cannot live with him that hath better judgement in the palate of his mouth, then in his heart. This was also his saying, that the soule of a lover, lived in anothers bodie. And that in al his life time he repented him of three things. The first was if that he ever told limeth in fecret to any woman the fecond, that euer he went by water, when he might hauegone by land: the third that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious old man, he would fay to reproue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it. helpe it not besides with your vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the people that was suspected to be a poyforer, and would needs paffe fome wicked law by voice of the people, he would fav: O yong man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drinke the drugges thou givest, or to receive the lawes thou offerest. Another time, being reuiled by one that led a lewd and naughrie life:Go thy way, faid he, I am no man to foold with thee; for thou art fo vsed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thee; but for my felfe, I neuer vie to heare feolding, and much leffe delight to feold. These behis wife sayings we find written of him, whereby we may the easilier coniecture his manners and nature. Now when he was chosen Confull with his friend Valerius Cate and Flacens, the gouernment of Spaine fell to his lot, that is on this fide of the river of BETIS. So Flacens Cato having fuddued many people by force of armes, & won others also by friendly means: for confete. dainly there came a maruellous great army of y barbarus people, against him, & had enuironed career de. him fo, as he was in maruellous danger, either shamefully to be taken prisoner, or to be flaine in the field. Wherefore he fent prefently vnto the CBLTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbors vnto the marches where he was. Thefe CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hundred talents to come and helpe him: but the ROMAIN's that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous peopleto defend them. Then Cate told them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonor vnto them. For said he, if the field be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promifed, with the spoile and money of our enemies; and if we lose it, then our selues and they lye by it, being left neither man to pay nor yet any to aske it. In the end he wan the battell, after a fore conflict, and after that time he had maruellous good fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the wals of the cities that were on this fide the river of B # r1 s, were by his commandement razed in one day, which were many and full of good fouldiers. Himfelfe writeth, that he tooke moe cities in Spaine, then he remained there dayes: and it is no vaine boast, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the fouldiers under him had gotten well in this journey, and were rich, yet he caused a pound weight of filuer to be giuen to euery fouldier besides: saying he liked it better that many should returne home with filuer in their purses, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himselfe he affirmed: that of Catenabe all the spoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, saving that which he took in meate finance and drinke. And yet faid he, I speake it not to reproue them that grow rich by such spoiles: from spoiles: but because I would contend in vertue rather with the best, then in money with the richest, or in couctousnesse with the most auaritious. For not onely he himselfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his Officers also under him kept the same course. In this Spanish iourney, he he had fine of his fernants with him, whereof one of them called Pacens, brought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the spoile was fould to them that would give most.

Cate fold the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treasurie chests of sauing Differd be. at Rome. Now while Cate was in Spaine, Scipio the Great that was his enemie, and fought to hinder the course of his prosperity, and to have the honour of conquering all the rest of and Scipio. Spaine, he made all the friends he could to the people, to be chosen in Catoes place. He was no sooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authority ceasie the sooner. Cato hearing of his hastie coming, tooke onely fine enfignes of footemen, and fine hundred horfemen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his journy homeward, he ouercame a people in Spaine called the LACETANI-ANS, and tooke fixe hundred traitours also that were fled from the Romaine's campe to their enemies, and did put to death enery mothers child of them. Scipio storming at that, said Cato did him wrong. But Cate to mocke him finely, faid: It was the right way to bring Rome to flourish, when noble borne citizens would not suffer meane borne men, and vostarts as himselfe was, to go before them in honour: and on the other fide when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with those that were of noblest race, and farre about them in calling. For all that, when Caiv came to Rome, the Senate commanded that nothing should be changed nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his office. So that the gouernement for which scipio made fuch earnest fute in Spain , was a greater disgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: because he passed all his time and office in peace, having no occasion offeredhim to do any notable feruice worthy memorie. Furthermore, Catoafter he had beene Confull, and had granted to him the honourto triumph, did not as many others do, that feeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honour and dignitie; who, when they have bene called to the highest offices of state, as to be Consuls, and have also granted them the honour to triumph, do then leaue to deale any more in matters of state, and dispose themselues to line merily and quietly at home and not to trouble themselues any more. Now Cate farre otherwise be-Caren affer haued himselfe: for he would neuer leaueto exercise vertue, but began afresh, as if he had bene a yong nouice in the world, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and pleade their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his friends also into the warres : as he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Consull, and was one of the Lieutenants at the conquest of the country of THRACE, and ynto the provinces adioyning to the river of Danv By vpon those marches. After that, he was in GR BC B also, Colonell of a thousand footemen, under Manius Aquilius, against king Antiochus surnamed the Great, who made the Romaines so much affraid of him, as euer they were of enemy, but Hannibal. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of Asia, which Selencus Nicanor enioyed before, and had subdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was so proud hearted, as he would needs have wars with the Romains, whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of warres, faying it was to fet the GRECIANS at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philip, and of the MACEDONIANS, through the goodnes of the Romaines. Notwithstanding, he came out of Asia into Grece with a maruellous great army, and all Grece was straight in armes and in wonderfull danger, because of the great promises and large hopes the governours of diuerse cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted with money) did make vnto him. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadours vntothecity, and sent Titus Quintus Flaminius among others, who kept the greatest part of the people from rebelling (that were easily drawn to giue care to this innouation) as we have expressed more amply in his life: And Caso being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the Corinthians, those of Patras, and the Egrans, and made them sticke still to the Romain es, and continued a long time at Athens. Some say they find an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their auncestours: wherein he said, he tooke great pleasure to see Athens, for the beauty and statelinesse of the citic. But this is false: for hespake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could have vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had bene disposed but he did like the lawes and customes of his own country, and the Komaine tongue so well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumius Albinus, who wrote an history in the Greek tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: Mariefaid Ca- Cate more, in his preface to Beare with him, it they found any imperfection further tongue: Marterial Carbon his he had deferued pardon indeede; if he had beene forced to have written his storie in the miss Albimius Albim Greeke tongue, by order of the states of GRECE, called the councel of the Amphictyons. They fay the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had vttered quickly in maint for few words vnto the interpreter, the interpreter was driven to deliver them againe with great for what is the words with great for which a few words vnto the interpreter, the interpreter was driven to deliver them againe with great for its like circumstances & many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words Grake lay all in their lippes, and the Romaines words in their heads. Now king Antiochus kept all King Antithe straights and narrow passages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary ochos arm). way and entrie into GRECE) and had fortified them aswell with an army that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walls and trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the mount it selfe in fundry places : and so he determined to remaine there, trufting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The ROMAINS also they dispaired vtterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Catoremembring with himselfe the compasse the Persi- caton do-ANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GRECE, he departed one night from ingraging the campe with part of the army: to proue if he could find the very compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken in the countrey, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore fouldiers were in maruellous ill taking. Cato feeing the danger they were brought into by this lewd guide, commanded all his fouldiers not to stir a foote from thence, and to tarrie him there : and in the meane time he went himselse alone, and Liscius Manlius with him, (a lustie man, and nimble to clime voon the rockes) and so went forward at aduenture, taking extreme and vncredible paines, and in much danger of his life, grabbling all night in the darke without Moone light, through wild Oliue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vpon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they fet vp certaine markes and tokens, vpon the highest toppes of the rockes they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had Mount done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the fouldiers, whom they led towards the marks Callidro. they had fet vp: vntill at the length they found their path-way againe, where they put their fouldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way failed them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and ingreater feare, not knowing they were so nearetheir enemies, as indeed they were. The day beganne to breake a litle, and one of them that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he faw the GREEKE's campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine fouldiers that kept watchthere. Whereupon Gato made them stay, and willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trice, to know his pleasure: so Cato said vnto them: My fellowes, I must have some of our enemics taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are camped and armed, and after what fort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke fouldiers. this feate standeth upon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne upon them sodainely, as Lyons do, no sooner spoken these words, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe the Thebildmountaines as they were, you those that kept the watch; and so setting vponthem, they being reliant at out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they sumps of straight brought him vnto Cato, who by oth of the prisoner, was aduertised how that y strength Catoes Sailof their enemies army was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley distr. of the faid mountaine; and that the fouldiers they faw, were fixe hundred Atolians, all braue sifed of the fouldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer King frength of Antiochus campe. mountaines: at which assault king Antioebus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake action boar forms of his prough selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake action boar forms of his prough selfer forms or the selfer forms of his prough selfer forms or the selfer forms or the selfer forms of his prough selfer forms or the selfer forms or the selfer forms of his prough selfer forms or the selfer f fome of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his horse back, and got him behind the preasse. And then there were none of his army that made any more refishance, or that could abide the fiercenesse of the Romaines. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was unpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one fide of them, and with bogges and deepe marishes on the other fide, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yetthey fell one vpon another in the straights, & ran so in heapes together, that they cast themfelues away, for feare of the Romaines I words that lighted vpon them in every corner. And there Marcus Cato, that never made ceremonie or nicenesse to praise himselfe openly, nor reckened it any shame to do it, did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out vponall victorie and king amio- famous exploits: and so did fer it out with all the oftentation and braue words he could give. For he wrote with his owne hands; and fuch as faw him chafe and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driven to fay, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINES, but the ROMAINES bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Confull felfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hote with chasing of the enemic, and spake a. loude with great joy before them all that neither he nor the people of Rome could recopence Cato, for his valiant service that day. After this battell, the Confull Manius sent Cato to Rome, to be the messenger himselfe to report the newes of the victorie. So he imbarked incontinently es Rome to and had fuch a faire wind, that he paifed ouer the feas to BRINDES without any danger, and went from thence vnto Tarentym in one day, and from Tarentym in foure dayes moreto Reme, And so he came to Rome in five dayes after his landing in ITALY, and made such speed that himfelfe was indeed the first messenger that brought newes of the victory. Whereupon he filled all Rome with iou and facrifices, and made the Romaines so proud, that ener after they thought themselues able men to conquer the world both by sea and land. And these be all the martiall deedes and noble acts Cato did. But for his doings in civill policy and state, he seemed to be of his opinion: that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good governour of the commonwealth could employ himselfe vnto: for he accused many & Subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, caroan at- he did alwaies stirre up some accuser, as he did Petilius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobilitie, the greatnesse of his house, and the magnanimitie of his mind, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him; being out of all feare, they should be able to condemne him; and so he let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he joyned with other that accused Lucius Scipie, his owne brother, and followed the matter to fore against him. that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the common-wealth; who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people renoked his condemnation. It is faid that Cato coming through the market place one day, and meeting with a yong man by the way that had ouerthrowne his adversarie in fuite. and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame & foile before the people, he embraced him with a good countenance, and faid vnto him: Oh my fonne, facrifices that good children should offer to their fathers soule, be not lambs nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from danger, in administration of the commonwealth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemics straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of four escore yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted. That it was a harder thing to give vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whom he lived. And yet was not this the last fute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was fourescore and tenne yeares of age, he accufed Servius Galba. And thus he lived as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall fuite and action. For when he wrestled with the first scipio the African about matters of flate and common wealth, he went on vnto the time of the fecond, that was adopted by the first Scipioes sonne, the natural I sonne of Paulus Amylius, who ouercame Perseus, king of Machon.

Furthermore, Marcus Cato ten yeares after his Gonfulship, sued to be Censor, which was in Rome the greatest office of dignitie that any citizen of Rome could attaine varo and as a man Thedignity may fay, the roome of all glory and honor of their common wealth. For among other authorities, the Cenfor had power to examine mens lives and manners, and to punish every offendor, she cenfor. For the Romain's were of that mind, that they would not have men marry, beget children, live prinately by themselucs, and make seasts and bankets at their pleasure, but that they should stand in seare to be reproued and enquired of by the magistrate; and that it was not good to give every body liberty, to do what they would, following his owne lust and fancie. And they judging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, & in the fight of the world, vsed to choose two Censors, that were two Surneyors of maners, to feethat enery man behaued himselfe vertuously, & gaue not themfelues to pleasure, nor to breake the lawes and customes of the common welth. These officers censors were called in their tong, Cenfores, and alwayes of custome, one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a commoner. These two had power and authority to disgrade a Knight, by taking away his horse, and to put any off the Senate, whom they saw liue dissolutely and disorderly. It was their officealfo, to feffe and rate every citizen according to the estimation of their goods to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of every man, & to keep books of them, befides many o. ther prerogatives they had belonging to their office. Therfore whe Catocameto fue for this office among other, the chiefest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very enuy, thinking it shame and dishonor to the Nobility, to suffer men that were meanely borne, and vp-tours and flarts (the first of their house and name, that cuer came to be are office in the state) to be called & Nobilitie preferred vnto their highest offices of state in all their comon wealth. Other also that were il liucrs, and knowing that they had offended the lawes of their country, they feared his cruelry too Carreffine. much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, having the law in his owne hands. So when they had confulted together about it, they did fet vp feuen competitors against him, who flattered the people with many faire words and promises, as though they had need of magistrates to vse them gently, and to do things for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shewing, no countenance that he would viethem gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for o rations, threatning those that had lived naughtily and wickedly, he cried out: that they must reforme their citie, and perswaded the people not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpest Phisitions: and that himselfe was such a one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaceus another, in whose company he hoped (they two being chose Censors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydraes heads) all vanitie and voluptuous pleasures, that were crept in amongst them; and that he saw well inough, how all the other futers fought the office by dishonest means, fearing such officers as they knew would deale instly and vprightly. Then did the people of Rome shew themselves nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refused not the sowernesse or seueritie of Cato, but rejected these meale-mouthed men, that feemed ready to pleafe the people in all things: and thereupon chose Gentler. Marcus Cato Censor, and Valerius Flaceus to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had bene present officer, and no suter for the office, being in themselves to give it to whom they cannot atta thought good. The first thing he did after he was stalled in his Censorship, was that he named in his Censorship. Lucius Valerius Flaccus his friend and fellow Cenfor with him, prince of the Senate: and among Cato pus many other also whom he thrust out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Se-Lucius nate, that had bene Confull scuen yeares before, and was brother also vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MACEDON in battell, which was greater glorie to him, of the Sethen that he had bene Consull. But the cause why he put him off the Senate, was this: This Lu-nate. cius Quintius caried euer with him a young boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credite vnto, as to any of his best familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a put Quin. time whilest Lucius Quintius was Consull and governor of a province, that he made a feast, time of the and this boy being face him the bo and this boy being fet at his table, hard by him, as his maner was, he began to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was pretily merrie: and foothing him, told him he loued him fo dearely, that vpon his departing from Rome, when y sword-players were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated swords, to shew the people pastime, he came his way, & left the fight of that he neuer faw, that was very desirous to have seen a man killed. The this Lucius Quinteus, to make him feethe like, faid care not for y fight thou hast lost, boy, for I wil let thee fee as much

And when he had spoken these words, he commanded a prisoner condemned to die, to be ferched and brought into his hall before him, and the hang-man with his axe: which was forthwith done according to his commandement. Then asked he the boy, if he would straight indergel fee the man killed: Yea fir faid the boy: and with that he bade the hang-man strike off his head: Most writers report this matter thus: And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Semetinte, that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of Rome. Now Lucius Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being offended withall, could not tell what to do, but befought the people that they would command Cato to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato openly before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was notfo: Cate would have him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who faid he would not fweare: whereupon the people judged straight that he deserved well that shame. So not long after, certainegames being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary placethat was appointed for those that had bene Consuls, he went to sit aloose off amongst the multitude. The people tooke piție on him, and made such ado about him, as they forced him to rife, and to go fit among the other Senators that had bene Confuls: faluing the best they could, the sharne and dishonour happened vnto so noble a house. Caso put out of the Senate alfo, one Manlius, who was in great toward linesse to have bene made Consult the next yeare following, onely because he kissed his wifetoo louingly in the day time, and before his daughter: and reproouing him for it, he told him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it thundered. So when he was disposed to be merrie, he would say it was happy with him when suppler thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the victo-

Merry with ries he had wonne of the great King Antiochus: which wanne him much ill will, because it appeared to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the African, that was dead. But the thing that most grieued the people, of all other extremities he vsed, was his abandereth. putting downe of all feafts and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to be openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, because it was so common athing, and enery man was giuen so to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise enery citizens goods, and rated their apparell, their coaches, their litters, their wines chaines and iewels, & alother moneables and houshold stuffe, that had cost aboue a thousand fine hundred Drachmes apeece, at ten times as much as they were worth to the end that fuch as had bestowed their mony inthose curious trifles, should pay so much more subsidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners thereof should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasurie to the end that they who were grieued with this taxe, and saw other pay lesse subsidie (that were as much worth as themselues, by liuing without, such toyes) might call home them-felues againe: and lay afide fuch foolish brauery and finenesse. Notwithstanding Cato, was ennied euery way. First, of them that were contented to pay the taxe imposed, rather then they would leaue their vanitie; and next, of them also, that would rather reforme themselues, then pay theraxe. And somethinke that this law was deuised rather to take away their goods, then to let Superfluons them to make any shew of them: & they have a fond opinion besides, that their riches are better things rec scene in superfluous things, then in necessary. Whereat they say Aristotle the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things.

And Scopas the THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar friends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, and to make him grant it the fooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and ming thing, and to make him grant it the 100ner, told him it was a thing he might went part, and di intojes, did him no good. Mary faid he, all the goods I haue, are in fuch toyes as do me no good. So this couetous desire we haue to be rich, cometh of no necessary desire in nature, but is bread in vs by a false opinion from the common fort. Now Caio caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and seuere. For he cut off the pipes and quils prinate men had made to conuey water into their houses and gardens, robbing the city of the water that came from their common conduit heads, and did plucke downealfo mens porches that were made before their doores into the streete, and brought downe the prises of common workes in the city, and moreouer raised the common farmes and customes of the city, as high as he could

MARCUS CATO. all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of most men. Wherefore Titus

Flaminius, and certaine other being bent against him in open Senate, caused all Catoes couenants and bargaines made with the mafter worke-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings & holy places, to be made voide, as things greatly prejudiciall to the commonwealth. And they did also stirre up the boldest & rashest of the Tribunes of the people against him because they should accuse him vitto the people, and make request he might be condemned in the

When some wondered why diverse meane men and vnknowne persons had images set up of them, and there were none of him, he gaue them this answer: I had rather men should aske why roustimes the Senate vsed to cast their eyes vpo him, as passengers on the sea do looke vpon the master of the ship in a storme; and that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance, vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as by himselfe. His authority was great in matters of state, for his wise-dome, his eloquence, and great experience. Befides this commendation, they praifed him for what cate a good fatherto his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good fauer for his profit: for he was neuer carelesse of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore me thinkes I must bis hops, needs tell you by the way some part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him: First ground

He said moreover, that he wrote goodly histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his son might learne in his fathers house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell the. He said also, that he tooke as great heed of speaking any foule or vncomely words before his son, as he would have done if he had bene before the Veitall Nunnes. He neuer was in the hot house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the Romaines at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathethemselues with their fathers in law, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwards they having learned of the GREEKES to wash themselves naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe euen with their wives. There lacked no towardlinesse, nor good disposition in Catoes sonne, to frame himselfe vertuous for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himselfe willing to follow whatsoener his father had taught him. Howbeit he was fuch a weake puling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, and therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous stoutly in the battell, in which Perfeus King of MACEDON was ouerthrowne by Paulus Amylius: where his fword being striken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweaty besides, he sell into a great fury, and prayed some of his friends to help him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemics in that place where his fword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them; and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much ado, being vnder such an heape of dead bodies and other weapons as well Romaines as Macedonians, one lying on another. Paulus Amylius the Generall hearing of this act of his, did highly commend the yong man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his fon, in the which he praiseth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recouering of his sword againe. Afterwards, this Cato the yonger maried Tertia, one of Paulus Æmylius daughters, and fifter vnto Scipio the second, and so was matched in this noble house, not only for his owne vertues sake, but for respect of his fathers dignitic and authority: whereby the great care, paines, and study that Cato the father took in bringing vp his sonne, in vertue & learning, was honourably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great number of young litle slaues which he bought, when any would fell their prisoners in the warres. He did chuse them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them vnto, and that a man might breake them like young colts, or little whelpes. But none of them all, how many socuer he had, did euer go to any mans house, but when himselfe or his wifedid fend them. If any manaske them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or els they must sleepe:

then lust and defire of women: he was contented his flaues might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a peece of mony he appointed them to pay, but with straight commandement besides, that none of them should deale with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gaue himselfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his servants did about his person saying that it was a foule thing for a gentleman or nobleman, to fall out with his seruants for his belly. Afterwards as he rose to better state, & grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he wold scourge the with whips & leather thongs, that had not waited as they should haue done at the boord, or had forgotte any thing he would haue had done. He would energraftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to death before them all: Howbeit in his later time he grew greedy, & gaue vp his tillage, faying that it was bushasary more pleafant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his mony furely, and bring a certaine reuenueto his purse, he bestowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hote bathes, places fit for fullers craft; vpon medowes and pastures, vpon copiles and young wood; and of all these he made a great and a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would fay, Iupiter him felfe could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea; and the vsury he tooke cate a by fea, was most extreme of all other, for he vsed it in this fort, He would hauethem to whom he great offer they should have so many ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, whereof Quintius his slave whom he had manumissed, was made his factor, and vied to saile and trafof Quintius his slave whom he had manumissed, was made his factor, and vied to saile and trafof probability. ficke with the merchants, to whom he had lent his mony out to viury. And thus he did not venture all the mony he lent, but a litle peece onely for his part, and got maruellous riches by his v. furie. Moreouer he lent money to any of his flaues, that would therewith buy other yong flaues, whom they taught and brought vp to do feruice, at Catoes charge and coft; and then they fold them again at the yeares end, and fome of them Cato kept for his owne feruice, and gaue his flaues as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his fon in like maner to make profit of his mony, he told him it was no wife mans part to diminish his substance, but rather the part of a widow. Yetthis was a token of a most greedy couetous mind, that he durst affirme him to be divine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was growne very old, Carneades the ACADEMICK, and Diggenes the STOICKE, were fent from ATHENS as Ambassadors to Rome, to sue for a releafe of a fine of five hundred talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIAN'S vpon a condemnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance by the sentence of the Sicyont- corneades ANS, at the fuite of y Or op IANS. Immediatly when the fetwo philosophers were arrived in the use Philocity of Rome, the yong gentlemen that were given to their books, did visit and welcome them, sophers sent and gaite great reverence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneader. Amballar whole grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse then the same ranne of him, Rome. & specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not fuppresse his praise. Rome straight was ful, as if a wind had blowne this rumor into euery mans earcithat there was a Grecian arrived, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence wold leade a man as he lift. There was no other talke a while through the whole citie, he had fo inflamed the yong gentlemens minds with love and defire to be learned; that all other pleafures and delights were let afide, and they disposed themselues to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophic, as if some secret and divine inspiration from about had procured them to it. Wherof the Lords and Senators of Rome were glad; and reioyced much to fee their youth fo well given to knowledge, and to the studie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the companie of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato, even from the beginning that yong men began to study the Greeke tongue, & that it grew in estimation in Rome, did dislike led the of its searing less the youth of Rome that were desirous of learning and cloquence, would vetter. ly give over the honor and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he saw the estimation and same tongs. of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such fort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate made sure to be their interpreter: he determined then to conuey them out of the city by fome honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambaffadours were long there and had not difpatch: confidering also they were cunning men, and could eafily perfwade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this onely might persuade them to determine some answer for them, and so to send them home againe to their schooles, to teach their children of GRECE, and to let alone the children of Rom E, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any private ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought but because he generally hated Philosophie, and of ambition despised the muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had said, the ancient Socrates was but a busie man, and a stirrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to viling tyranny and rule in his country: but peruerting and changing the manners and customes of the same, and alluring the subjects thereof to a disliking of their lawes and ancient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the art of Eloquence: saying his schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in another world before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his sonne for the study of the Greeke tongue, he said to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger found then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecie or inspiration) that fo long as the Romaines disposed themselves to study the Greeke tongue, so long would they marre and bring all to nought. And yet time hath proued his vaine words false and vntrue. For the city of Rome did neuer flourish so much, nor the Romaine Empire was ever so great, as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did not onely hate the Philosophers of GRECE, but did mislike them also that professed phisicke in Rome. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the King of PERSIA fent for him, and offered him a great fumme of gold and filter, if he would come and ferue him: who fware he would neuer ferue the barbarous people that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed it was an oath that all other Philitions sware ever after: wherefore he commanded his fonne to flie from them all alike, and faid he had written a little booke of phisicke, with the which he did heale those of his house when they were sicke, and did keepe them in health, when they were whole. He neuer forbade them to eate, but did alwayes bring them vp with hearbs, and certaine light meates, as mallard, ringdoues and hares: for fuch meates. faid he are good for the fick, and light of digestion, saving that they make them dreame & fnort. that cate them. He boasted also how with this maner of phisicke, he did alwayes keepe himselfe in health, & his family from ficknesse. Yet for all that, I take it, he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife and his fonne also. But he himselfe was of a strong nature, and a lusty body, full of strength, & health, and lined long without sicknesses for that when he was a very old man and past mariage, he loued women well, and maried a yong maiden for that cause onely. After his first wife was dead, he maried his sonne vnto Paulus A Emylius daughter, the sister of Scipio, the second African. Cato himselfe being a widower, tooke paines with a prety your maide that waited in his house, and came by stealth to his chamber: howbeit his haunt could not long continue secret in his house, and specially where there was a young gentlewoman maried, but needs must be spied. So, one day when the young maid went somewhat boldly by the chamber of yong Cato, to go to his father, the yong man faid neuer a word at it: yet his father perceiued that he was somewhat ashamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his fonne and daughter in law were angry with the matter, faying nothing to them of it, nor shewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was with a trainethat followed him, amongst whom was one Salonius that had benehis clearke, and waited vpon him as the rest did. Cato calling him out aloud by his name, asked him if he had not yet bestowed his daughter. Salonius answered him, he had not yet bestowed her, nor would not before he made him privy to it. Then Caro told him againe: I have found out a husband for her, and a fonne in law for thee, and it will be no ill match for her vnleffe she mislike the age of the man; for indeed he is very old, but otherwise there is no fault in him. Salonius told him againe, that for that matter he referred all to him, and his daughter alfo, praying him euento make what match he thought good for her: for she was his humble seruant. and relyed wholly vpon him, standing in need of his fauour and furtherance. Then Cato began to discouer, and told him plainely he would willingly marrie her himselfe. Salonius therewith was abashed, because he thought Cato was too old to marrie then, and himselfe was no fit man to match in any honourable house, specially with a Consull, and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the end, when he faw Cato meant good earnest, he was very glad of the match, and fo with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then you the mariage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the sonne taking some of his kinne and friends with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for spite he should bring him a steppe-mother into his house. Then his father cried out, and faid: O my fonne, I pray thee fay not fo, I like well all thou doeft, and I find no cause to complaine of thee: but I doit, because I desire to have many children, and to leave many fuch like citizens as thou art, in the common wealth. Some fay that Pififratus the tyrant of A-THENS, made fuch a like answer vnto the children of his first wife, which were men growne when he maried his second wife Timonassa, of the towne of Argos, of whom he had (as it is reported) lophon, and Theffalus. Butto returne againe to Cato, he had a fonne by his fecond wife, whomhe named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldest sonne died in his fen by her. office being Prætor, of whom he often speaketh in divers of his bookes commending him for a very honest man. And they say, he tooke the death of him very patiently, and like a graue wise man, not leaving therfore to do any service or busines for the state, otherwise then he did before.

Catest an-Cato mari daughter, ry old man

And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus furnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of government and state, after they were waxen old. For hethought it a charge and dutie, whereunto every honest man whilest he lived was bound in al piety. Nor as Scipio African had done before him, who perceiuing that the glory & fame of his doings did but purchase him the ill will of his citizens, he changed the rest of his life into quietnesse, and for sooke the city and all dealings in commonwealth, and went and dwelt in the countrey. But as there was one that told Diony fins the tyrant of Syracvsa, as it is written, that ting and he could not dye more honorably, then to be buried in the tyranny: euen fo did Cato thinke, that monuments. he could not waxe more honeftly old, then in feruing of the comonwealth vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was defirous a litle to recreate and refresh himselfe, he passed his time away in making of bookes, and looking vpon his husbandry in the countrey. This is the cause why he wrote so many kinds of bookes and stories. But his till age and husbandry in the countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profite. For he faid he had but two forts of reuenue, tillage and sparing: but in age what source he did in the countrey, it was all for pleafure, and to learne fomething euer of nature. For he hath written a book of the country life, and of tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe fruits: he would needs shew such singularitie and skill in all things. When he was in his house in the country, he fared a little better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and fuch as had land lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry categories. with them: for that his company was not onely pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe, but pany pleafant and liking to old folkes as himselfe. alfoto the younger fort. For he had feene much, and had experience in many things, and vied much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest means your to breed loue amongst men, and at his ownetable would alwayes praise good men and vertuous The table 4 citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is coprocure thought the last notable act and service he did in the common wealth, was the overthrow of lowe, and CARTHAGE: for indeed he that wan it & razed it vtterly, was Scipio the second, but it was chiefly through Catoes counsell and aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CAR- be red. THAGINIANS, and chanced upon this occasion. Cato was sent into Africk & to understand the cause and controuersie that was betweene the CARTHAGINIAN'S and Massinissa, King of Nv- Catoda MIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither because King Massinisa therefile had ever bene a friend vnto the ROMAINES, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become tof wars their confederates fince the last warres, in the which they were ouerthrowne by Scipiothe first, Carthagiwho tooke for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed vpon them besides, a niam. great year ely tribute. Now when he was come into that country, he found not the city of Car-THAGE in misery, beggery, and out of heart, as the Romains supposed: but full of lusty youths, very rich and wealthy, and great store of armour and munition in it for the wars, so that by reafon of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high faile, and stooped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the Romain's to leaue to vnderstand the controuersies betwixt the Carthaginians and Massinissa, and ratherto provide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that hath euer bene an ancient enemie to the Romaines, and ener fought to be reuenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growneto that greatnes and courage in fo short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the Romannes, as ever they did before. Therfore fo foone as he returned to Rome, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHA-GINIAN'S had received by the last wars they had with them, had not so much diminished their power and strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisdome: for it was to be feared much, lest their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakned them for the wars. And that they made warres now with the NVMIDIANS, to exercise them only, meaning afterwards to war with themselues: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of warres, only expecting time and oportunitie to breake with them againe. They say moreouer, that besides the perswassions he vsed, he brought with him of purpose AFRICKE figs in his long fleeues, which he shooke out among st them in the Senate: & when the Senators maruelled to fee fo goodly faire greene figges, he faid: The country that beareth them, is not about three dayes failing from Rome. But yet this is more strange which they report of himbesides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was ever the one end of his tale: Me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be veterly destroyed. Fublius Scipio Nasica, vsed euer in like maner the contrarie speech: that he thought it meete Can-THAGE should stand. This Publius Scipio saw, in my opinion, that the Romaines through their gaing Cates pride and infolencie were full of abfurdities, and caried themselues very high, by reason of their forthede: happy successe and victories, and were so lostie minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them:

frequing of carthage. and that by reason of their great authority, they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therfore he spake it that the scare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raine in the insolencie of the people of Rome, who knew wellenough, that the CARTHAGINIAN'S Were of no sufficient power to make wars with the Romaines, nor yet to ouercome them: and even fo were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be feared at all. Cato still replied to the contrary, that therinconsisted the greatest danger of all that acity which was euer of great forceand power, and had bene punished for former warres and miserie, would alwayes have an eye of reuenge to their enemies, and be much like a horse that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would run vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor found aduice, so to suffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recouer their strength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward danger, and the feare they flood in to lofe their conquest: and specially, when they left meanes within the citie selfe to fall still again to their former quest: and specially, when they left meanes within the citie selfe to fall still again to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion of the third and last war the Romaines had against the Carthaginians. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and before his death he prophecied, as a man would fay, who it should be that should end those wars. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge onely as a Colonel ouer a thousand footmen; but in all battels, and wheresoeuer there was wars, he fhewed himselfe euer valiant and wise. Insomuch as newes being brought thereof continually Vnto Rome, and Cato hearing them, spake (as they say) these two verses of Homer:

This onely man right wife reputed is to be, All other seeme but shadowes, set by such wise men as he.

Which prophecie Scipio soone after confirmed true by his doings. Moreouer, the issue Cato left behind him, was a fonne he had by his fecond wife: who was called (as we faid before) Cato San LONIAN, by reason of his mother, and a litle boy of his eldest son that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prætor, but he left a sonne behind him that came to be Confull, and was grandfather vnto Cato the Philosopher, one of the most vertuous men of his time.

THE COMPARISON OF Aristides with Marcus Cato.

OW that we have fet downe in writing, these notable and worthie Arifides things of memorie : if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhaps the difference betweene the one and the other the comwill not easily be discerned, seeing there be so many similardes and re- mon wilsh. semblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in euery particularitie, as we would do Poets workes, or pictures drawne in tables: first, in this we shall find them much alike, that having had nothing else to preferre and commend them, but their onely vertue and wisedome, they have bene both governours in their common wealth. and have thereby atchieued to great honour and estimation. But me thinkes when Aristides came to deale in matters of state, the common wealth and Seigniorie of ATHENS being then of nogreat power, it was easie for him to aduance himselse, because the other Gouernours and Captaines of his time, and that were competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richest persons then at Athens in revenue, was but at five hundred bushels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni. The second taxe was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushels, and they called them Zeugitæ. Where Marcus Caso coming out of a litle village from a rude countrey life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge him. felscinto a bottomlesse sea of gouernment in the common wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by fuch governours and Captaines, as Curius Fabricius, and Oftilius werein old time. For the people of Rome did no more bestow their offices vpon such meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobilitie of their houses, and voon their riches that gauethem most money, or sued earnestly to them for the office. And by reason of their great power and authority, they would be waited vpon and sued vnto, by those that sought to beare the honourable offices of the state and commonwealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to have Themistocles an adversary and competitor, being neither of noble house, nor greatly rich (for they say, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fine hundred talents, when he began to deale in state) in respect as to contend for the chiefest place of honour and authority against Scipio African, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, having no other maintenance, nor helpe to trust vnto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all vprightnesse. Moreouer, Aristides at the battels of Marathon, and of Platæes, was but one of the ten captaines of the Athenians: where Cato was chosen one of two Consulsamong many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Censors, before seven other that made suite for it, which were all men of great reputation in the city, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Arifides was neuer

the chiefest in any victory. For atthe battell of MARATHON, Militades was the Generall; and at the battell of Salamina, Themistocles: and at the journey of Plat Ees, king Pausamas as Herodotus fai.h, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that strined with Aristides for the second place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Gallimachus, and Cynegirus, enery one of the which did notable valiant feruice at those battels. Now Cato was Generall himselfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthinesse and counsell, during the warre he made in Spaine while he was Confull. Afterwards also in the journey where king Antiochus was ouerthrowne in the countrey of THERMOPYLES, Cate being but a Colonell of athousand footmen, and serving vnder another that was Confull, wanne the honour of the victory, when he did suddenly set vpon Antiochus behind, whereas helooked only to defend himselfe before. And that victory without all doubt was one of the chiefest acts that ever Cato did, who drave As IA out of GRECE, and opened the way vnto Lucius Scipio to paffe afterwards into Asia. So then for the wars, neither the one nor the other of them was ever overcome in battell: but in peace and civill government, Aristides was supplanted by Themissacles, who by practise got him to be banished Athens foratime. Whereas Cate had in manner all the greatest and noblest men of Rome that were in dipleasure histime, sworne enemies vnto him and having alwayes contended with them even to his last houre, he euer kept himselfe on sound ground, like a stout champion, and neuer tooke sall nor foile. For he having accused many before the people, and many also accusing him, himself was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the buckler and defence of his life and innocencie. Which was to him so necessary a weapon, and with it he could helpe himselfe in so great matters, that (in my opinion) it was the only cause why he neuer received dishonor, nor was vninfly condemned: rather then for any thing else he was beholding to fortune, or to any other that did protect him. And truly, cloquence is a fingular gift, as Amipater witneffeth, in that he wrote of Ariffeele the Philosopher after his death: saying that amongst many other singular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perfwade what he listed. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attaine any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Oeconomia, commonly called house-rule, considering that a city is no other, then an assembly of many housholds and houses together; and then is the city commonly strong and of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wife and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that banished gold and filuer from Laced Emon, and covined them mony of iron, that would be marred with fire and vinegar when it was hote, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not only cut off all superfluous expences that commonly waite vpon riches, but did also prouide that his people should lacke nothing necessary to line withall, fearing more to see a begger and needy person dwelling in his city, and enion the priniledges of the same, then a proud man by reason of his riches. So me thinks, Cato was as good a father to his houshold, as he was a good gouernour to the commonwealth: for he did honestly increase his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by sauing, and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote fundry good rules and precepts. Aristides contrariwise, made instice odious and slanderous by his pouerty, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans selfe that vsed instice. And yet Hesiodus the Poet, that commendeth instice so much, doth wishvs withall to be good husbands, reprouing floth and idlenesse, as the roote and original of all iniustice. And therefore me thinkes Homer spake wisely when he said:

In times past, neither did I labour, carke nor care For bufinesse, for family, for food, nor yet for fare: But rather did delight, with ships the seaes to saile. To draw abow, to fling a dart in wars, and to prenaile,

As giving vs to vnderstand, that instice and husbandry are two relatives, and necessarily linked one to the other: & that a man who hath no care of his owne things nor house, doth live vniustly, and taketh from other men. For inflice is not like oyle, which Phistions say is very wholsome for mans body, if it be applied outwardly and in contrary maner very ill, if a man drinke it neither oughtainst man to profit strangers, & in the end not to care for himself nor his. Therefore me thinkes this gouerning vertue of Arifides had a fault in this respect, if it be true that most Authors write of him: that he had no care nor forecast with him to leaue so much, asto marry his daughters withall, nor wherewith to bury himselfe. Where those of the house of Cato, continued Prætors and Confuls of Rome, euen vnto the fourth descent. For his sons sonnes, and yet lower, his sonnes sons sons came to the greatest offices of dignitie in Rome. And Aristides, who was in his time the chiefest man of GRECE, left his posterity in so great pouerty, that some were whether was in his time the effects that for GREEF stern in potenty in to great potenty that form were some fled to become foothfayers (that interpret dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy thing. him. But to cotrary this, it might be faid pouerty of it felf, is neither ill nor dishonest; but where it groweth by idlenesse, carelesse life, vanity and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honest, & liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iust, valiant, wise, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great figne of a noble mind: for it is vnpoffible that man should do any great things, that had such a base mind as to thinke alwaies vpon trifles; and that he should releeue the poore greatly, that lacketh himselfe reliefe in many things. And fure, riches are not so necessary for an honest man that will deale truely in the commonwealth, and gouernement, as is sufficiency: which being a contentation in it selfe, and desirous of no fuperfluous thing, it never withdraweth a man from following his businesse in the common wealth, that enjoyeth the fame. For God is he alone, who fimply and abfolutely hath no need of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefest vertue that can be in man, that cometh nearest vnto God, ought to be esteemed that, which maketh man to haue need of least things. For like as a lufticbody, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious apparell: euen fo a cleane life, and found house, is kept with a litle charge; and fo should the goods also be proportioned, according to vie and necessitie. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no defire to spend much, then he is a foole to travell to get more then he needeth; and if he do defire it, and dare not for niggardlinesse spend part of that he laboureth for, then he is miserable. Now would I aske Cate with a good will, if riches be made but to vsethem, why doe you boast then you have gotten much together, when a litle doth suffice you. And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you find, to drinke of the same tappe workmen & labourers do, not to care for purple died gownes, nor for houses with plastered walls: it followeth then that neither Aristides, nor Epaminodas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabritius, have forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vsenor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man that esteemed rootes and parsenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did seeth them himselfe in his chimney, whilest his wife did bake his bread, to talke so much of an Asse, and to take paines to write, by what art and industrie a man might quickly inrich himself. For it is true, that fufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is because it taketh from vs all defire of vnnecessary things, and maketh vs not to passe for them. And therefore we find that Arifides said, when rich Callias case was pleaded, that such as were poore against their wills, might well be ashamed of their pouerty; but such as were willingly poore had good cause and might justly rejoyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Aristides pouerty proceeded of a base mind and flouthfulnes, since he might quickly haue made himfelfe rich without any dishonestie at all, by taking onely the spoile of some one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tents. But enough for this matter, Further- wiether more, touching the victories and battels Cato had won, they did in maner litle helpe to increase the Empire of Rom B: for it was already so great, as it could almost be no greater. But Aristides cases did victories are the greatest conquest and noblest acts that the GRECIANS euer did in any wars:as most benethe lourny of Marathon, the battel of Salamina, & the battel of Plat Es. And yet there country. is no reason to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, northe walles of the city of Spaine which Cate ouerthrew and razed, vnto so many thousands of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrown and put to the fword by the GRECIANS, as well by land as by sea. In all which feruices, Arifides was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnesse in fighting: not withstanding he gaue other y glory of it, that defired it more then himselfe, as he did easily leave the gold & filuer vnto those that had more need of it then himself. Wherein he shewed himself of a nobler mind then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I wil not reproue Catoes maner, to commend & extoll himselfso highly aboue all other, since he himself saith in an orationhe made that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himself but this I thinke, his vertue is more perfect that defireth other should not praise him, then he that comonly doth vie to praise him-

felfe. For not to be ambitious, is a great flew of humanitie, and necessary for him that will liue amongst men of gouernment; and euen so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him that is infected withall. Of the which Arifides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Athing in the ristides did helpe Themistocles his chiefest enemie, in all his noblest acts, and did serue him (as a man would fay) like a private fouldier that guarded his person, when Themistocles was Generall, being the onely instrument and meane of his glory: which was indeed the onely cause that the city of ATHENS was faued, and restored again to her former good state. Cato contrariwise, croffing Scipio in all his enterprises, thought to hinder his voyage and iourney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hannibal, who untill that time was ever invincible; and so in the end. continuing him still in icalousie with the state, and euer accusing of him, he neuer left him till he had driven him out of the citie, and caused his brother Lucius Scipio to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperancy & modefly which Cate did euer commend so highly, Aristides truly kept them most fincerely. But Catoes second red for his wife, who maried a maid (that was neither fit for his dignitie and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a letcherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he cannot be excused with honestic, that being a man past mariage, brought his sonne that was maried, and his faire daughter in law, a step-mother into his house, and but a Clerks daughter, whose father did write for mony, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato maried her to satisfie his lust. or else for spite to be reuenged of his son, because his son could not abide his young filth he had before: either of these turneth stil to his shame, as well the effect as also the cause. Againe, the excuse he made to his sonne why he maried, was a lye. For if he had grounded his desire in-

toone after, that had bene of an honest house; and not to have lyen with a young harlatry filth. till his sonne had spied him; and then when he saw it was knowne, to go and mary her, and to make alliance with them, not because it was honourable for deed, to have gotten other children, as he said, that might be as honest man as his eldest sonnes then furely he had done well after the death of his first wife, if he had sought him another wife him to do it, but easiest tobe obtained.

THE LIFE OF Philopamen.

N the citie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caffander, one that was as nobly borne & of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time what soeuer. Not with standing, Fortune frowned on him in the end, infomuch as he was driven out of his country, & went to lie in the citie of MEGALIPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crausis, Philopemens father, a rare man, and nobly given crause, in all things, and one that loued him also very well. Now so long as men fa-Crausis lived, Cassander was so well vsed at his hands, that he could lack ther. nothing: and when he was departed this world, Cassander, to requite cassander, the love Crausis bare him in his life time, tooke his sonne into his charge, being an orphane, and Phlese taught him, as Homer said Achilles was brought vp by the old Phanix. So this child Philopamen messchooles master. grew to have noble conditions, & increased alwayes from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow to mans state, Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALIPOLITANS, tooke Ecdensus him into their gouernment. They were two Philosophers that had bene hearers of Arcefilaus in and remothe schoole of Academia, and afterwards employed all the Philosophie they had learned, upon Philosophie their gouerning of the common welth, and dealing in matters of state, as much or more, then so chilopaany other men of their time. For they delinered their city from the tyrannie of Aristodemus, who keptitin subjection, by corrupting those that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus also to drive the tyrant Nicocles, out of Sicyone. At y request of the Cyrenians, that were troubled with ciuil diffention & factions among them, they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the state of the common wealth, and stablished good lawes for them. But for the selues, they reckoned the education and bringing vp of Philopamen, the chiefest act that ever they did is udging that they had procured an vniversall good vnto all Grece, to bring vpa man of so noble a nature, in the rules & precepts of Philosophy. And to fay truly, GRECE did loue him passingly wel, as the philosophy. last valiant man she brought forth in her age, after so many great and famous ancient captaines: monthelast and did alwayes increase his power and authority, as his glory did also rise. Whereupon there was a Romaine, who to praise him the more, called him the last of the Grecians: meaning Green, that after him, GRECE neuer brought forth any worthy person, deseruing the name of a GRE-CIAN. And now concerning his person, he had no ill face, as many suppose he had: for his whole image is yet to be seene in the city of Dalphes, excelletly weldone, as if he were aline.

And for that they report of his hostesse in the citie of MEGARA, who tooke him for a seruing man: that was by reason of his courtesse, not standing vpon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For she understanding that the General of the Achaians came to Innethereal night, she bestirred her, and was very busic preparing for his supper, her husband peraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane feafon came Philopamen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his back. The simple woma feeing him no better apparelled, took him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and so praied him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He straight cast off his cloke, and began to fall to hew wood. So as Philopamen was busie about it, in cometh her husband, and finding him riuing of wood: Ha haha, faid he, my Lord Philopamen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing elfe, faid he in his Don I can tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither faire boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius said one day vnto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopamen, thou hast faire hands and good legs, but thou hast no belly for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this iesting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body, because he had both good horsemen and sootemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These icasts, schollers have taken vp in schooles; of Philipamen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it feemeth that the ambition & defire he had to win honour in his doings, was not without fome heate and wilfulnesse. For, because he would altogether follow Epaminonelas steps, he shewed his hardinesse to enterprise any thing, his wisedome to execute alt great matters, and his integrity also, in that no mony could corrupt him:but in civill matters and controuerfies, he could hardly other whiles keep himself within y bounds of modestie, patience, and currefie, but would often burft out into choler, and wilfulneffe. Wherefore it feemeth, that he was a better captaine for warres, then a wife gouernor for peace. And indeed, euen from his youth he euer loued foldiers & armes, and delighted maruellously in all martiall exercises: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of horses gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And because he feemed to have a naturall gift in wreftling, certain of his friends, & fuch as were careful of him, did wish himto giue himself most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made fuch profession, wold be no hinderance to their martial exercises. Answer was made him again. That the disposition of the person, & maner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like exercifes, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a souldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselues in good plight, by much fleeping, cating, and drinking, by labouring, and taking their case at certaine houres, by not misfing a iot of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to lose the force and strength of their bodie, if they did surfeit neuer so litle, or passed their ordinarie courseand rule of diet: where fouldiers contrariwiseare vsedto all change and diuersitie of life; and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse and scarcitie, and to watch in the night without sleepe. Philopæmen hearing this did not onely forfake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being generall of an armie, he fought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling and fuch kind of exercise, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become fouldiers to fight in defence of their countrey, that otherwife would have bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his book and schoolemasters, and began to weare armour in inuations the Mantineans vied to make vpon the Laced Emonians, to get some spoile on a sodaine, or to destroy a part of their countrey: Philopamen then would ever be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he vsed much hunting intime of peace, all to acquaint his bodie with toile and trauell, or else he would be digging of his grounds. For he had a faire mannor, not passing twentie furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke comonly after dinner or fupper; and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lie vpon some ill fauored mattreffe, as the meanest labourer he had, & in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine-men to labour in his vineyard, or els with his plough-men to follow the plough, and sometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the same. What soener he could spare & get in the wars, he spent it in buying of goodly horses, in making of faire armors, or paying his poorecountry mens ransome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goods and revenue, he fought only to increase them by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the inftest and best way of getting of goods. For he did not trisle therin, but imployed his whole

care and fludie vpon it, as one that thought it fit for enery noble man & gentleman fo to trauel, philippesource and increase his owne, that he should have no occasion to couet or vsurp another mans. men study He took no pleasure to heare all kind of matters, nor to reade all sorts of books of Philosophy: sillage. but those onely that would teach him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to reade Hemers workes, fauing those places only that stirred vp mens hearts most vnto valiantnes. But of all other stories, he specially delighted to reade Enangelus bookes, which treated of the minde. discipline of warres, how to set battels, and declared the acts and gests of Alexander the Great; light to faying that men should ever bring words vnto deeds, vnlesse they would take them for vaine reads & itories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in his books of the scates of warre, and how battels should be ordered, he was not only contented to see them drawn and set out in charts and discipline maps, but would also put them in execution, in the places themselues as they were set out. And of werest therforewhen the army marched in order of battel in the field, he would confider & study with himselfe, the sodaine events and raproches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they coming downe to the valley, orgoing out of a plaine, were to passe a river or a ditch, or through some straight: also when he should spread out his armie, or elle gather it narrow: and this he did not only forecast by himselfe, but would also argue the same with the captaines that were about him. For Philopamen doubtleffe was one of the odde men of the world, that most esteemed the discipline of warre, and sometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the most large field & most fruitful ground, that valiantnes could be exercised in: so that he despised and contemuedal that were no foldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleamenes King of LACED EMON, came one night vpon the sodaine, and gaue an affault to the citie of LEGALIPOLIS, so lustily that he draue backethe watch and got into the marketplace, and wanne it. Philopamen hearing of it, ran immediatly to the refcue. Neuertheleffe, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble fouldier, yet he could not repulse the enemics, nor driue them out of the city but by this meanes he got the citizens leisure, and some the hieratime to get them out of the town to faue themselves, staying those that followed them: & made from cleon Cleaments fill waite vpon him, fo that in the end he had much ado to faue himselfe, being the last mones King man and very fore hurt, and his horse also slaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being aduertifed that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotte into thecity of MESSINA, he fent vnto the tolet men parp them understand, that he was ready to deliver them their city, lands, & goods, againe. But Philo- forehart. pamen seeing his countrymen very glad of these newes, and that every man prepared to returne againe in hast, he staid them with these perswasions, shewing them that Cleomenes denice was not to deliver them their city, but rather to take them together with their city; foreseeing well inough that he could not continue long there, to keep naked walles and empty houses, and that himselse in the end should be compelled to go his way. This perswasion staid the MBGALIPO-LITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occasion to burne and plucke downea great part of the city, and caried away a great fumme of money and a great spoile. Afterwards when king Anti-King Anti-King Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIAN's against Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of gonus same the mountaines of Sellasia, and kept all the passages, and wayes vnto them out of all those Achians quarters: King Antigonus fet his army in battell hard by him, determining to fet vpon him, and against to drive him thence if he could possibly. Philopamen was at that time among it the horimen with King of his citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the fide of them, being a great number of footmen and Laceds. excellent good fouldiers, which did shut in the taile of all the army. So they were commanded to ftand stil, & to keep their place, vntil such time as they did shew them a red coate of armes on the top of a pike, from the other wing of the battell, where the King himselfe stood in person, Notwithstanding this straight commandement, the captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to fee if they could force the Laced Emonians that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwise, kept their place and order, as they were commanded. Eudidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing how their enemies footmen were seuered from their horsmen, sodainly sent the lightest armed souldiers and lustiest fellowes he had in his bands, to philose. giue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces mensfact in on them, because they had no horsemen for their guard. This was done, and these light armed men did maruellously trouble and disorder the LLLYRIANS. Philopamen perceiving that, and in considering the consid confidering how these light armed men would be easily broken and driven back, since occasion were. selfe enforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes.

But when he faw he could not make them vnderstand it, and that they made no reckoning of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, because he had not yet attained any credit or estimation to be judged a man that could inuent or execute any stratageme of warre, he went thither himselfe, and tooke his citizens with him: and at his first coming, he so troubled these light armed men, that he made them flie, and flue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them give a lustic charge vpon the enemies, whilest they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his horse and marched on foot vp hill and down hill, in rough and stonie wayes, full of springs and quauemires, being heavily armed at all peeces as a manat armes, and fighting in this fortvery painfully and vneafily, he had both his thighes paftthrough with a dart, having a leather thong on the middest of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the flesh, yet was it a strong blow; for it pierced both thighes through and through, that the yron was seene on the other fide. Then was he so cumbred with this blow as if he had bene shackled with irons on his fect, and knew not what to do: for the leather fastened in the middest of the dart, did grieue him maruellously, when they thought to have pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, so as neuer a man about him durst set his hands to it. Philopamen on the other fide, seeing the fight terrible on either fide, and would soone be ended: it fpited him to the guts, he would so faine have bene among them. So at the length he made such firugling, putting backe one thigh, and fetting forward another, that he knapped the staffe of the dartasunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this side, and the other on the other fide. Then when he saw he was at liberty again, he took his sword in his hand, and ran through the midst of them that fought, vnto the foremost rankes, to meete with the enemie: forhathe gaue his mena new courage, and did fet them on fire with enuy, to follow his valiantnesse. After the battel was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN captaines, to proue them: who moved the horsemen to devide themselves, and give the charge, before the signe that was commanded. They answered him, that they were forced to do it against their wils, because a young MEGALIPOLITAN gentleman gaue acharge with his company, before the figne was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them the young gentleman played the part of a wife and valiant captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus testimony, gaue great reputation vnto Philogemen, as we may easily imagine. So King Antigonus maruellously intreated him he would ferue with him, and offered him aband of men at armes, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopamen refused his offer, and chiefly because he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commanded by any. Notwithstanding, because he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there was warres, only to continue himselfe in exercise therof. So when he had serued a long time with the CR BTANS, which were valiant soldicrs, and very expert in all policies and feates of war, and moreouer were men of a moderate & spare diet: he returned home again to AcHAIA, with so great credit and reputation of euery one that he was presently chosen General of all the horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found many horimen very ill horied, vpon litle iades, fuch as might be gotten cheapest, and that they vsed not to go themselues in person to the warrs, but did send other in their stead: and to be short, that they neither had hearts, nor experience of the wars, and all because the Generals and captaines of the people of the Achaian's that ferued before him, did take no heed to those matters, as fearing to offed any, because they had the greatest authority in their hands, to punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopamen fearing none of all these things, would leave no part of his charge and dutie vndone, but went himselse in person to all the cities, to perswade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horfed, and well armed, that they might win honour in the field, be able to defend themselues, & ouerthrow their enemics. And where perfwafion could do no good, there he would fet fines vpon their heads that fo refused, and did vse to muster them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turneying, and barriers, and one to fight with another, and at fuch times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of peopleto giue them the looking on: that in short space he made them very forward, proper, and ready horsemen, whose chiefest property is, to keepe their order and rankes in the battell. So as when necessitie serued for the whole company of horsemento turne together, halfeturne, or whole turne, or elseuery man by himself: they were so throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe set in battell ray, did seeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued so together, and withal fo eafily, and at all times, and so oft, as they should turne, on the one side, or on the other. Now in agreat battel the Achaians had with the Ærolians, & the Elians, by the river of Lariffus, Demophantus Generall of the horsemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to Philopas fight with Philopame, who also made towards him, & gaue him first such ablow with his speare, that he strake him starke dead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his souldiers fled by & by yon it. This wan Philopemen great honour, who gaue no place to the yongest men in fighting roll of the most valiantly with his own hands:nor to the oldest men in wisdome, for the wife leading of his armie. Indeed the first man that made the people of Achaia growin power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time Achaia was of smal reckoning, because y cities of the same stood deuided betweene themselues, & Aratus was the first manthat made them ioyne together, and stablished among them an honest civil government. Wherby it happened, that as we see in brooks Aratural and rivers where any litle thing ftoppeth & falleth to the bottome, which the course of the water bringeth down the streame, there the rest that followeth doth vie to stay, and go no further: even fo in the cities of GRECE that were in hard state, & fore weakened, by faction one against another, the ACHAIANS were the first that staid themselves, and grew in amity one with the other, & afterwards drew on the rest of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederates. Some by helping & deliuering them from the oppression of tyrants, and winning other also by their peaceable gouernement and good concord: they had a meaning in this wife to bring all the country of Pelopones into one body & league. Neuerthelesse, while Aratus liued, they depended most vponthe strength and power of the Macedonians: first with Aratus sticking vnto king Piolomy, and then vnto Antigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in maner all the compared. state of GRECE. But when Philopemen came to gouerne, and to be the chiefest man, the ACHAI-ANS being strong inough to refiss the strongest, would march then no more vnder any other bodies ensigne, nor would suffer any more strange gouernours or captaines ouer them. For Aratus Aratus Aratus (as it feemed) was somewhat too soft and cold for the wars; and therfore the most things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, & by the kings friendships with whom he was great, as we have at large declared in his life. But Philopamen being a man of execution, hardy & valiant of person, & of very good fortune; in the first battel that euer he made, did maruellously increase the courage and hearts of the ACHAIANS: because vnder his charge they euer foiled their enemies, & alwayes had the vpper hand of them. The first thing Philopamen began withal at his Philopacoming, he changed the maner of fetting of their tables, & their fashion of arming the felues; for beforethey caried litle light targets, which because they were thin & narrow, did not couer half chainson. their bodies, & vsed speares far shorter then pikes, by reaso wherof they werevery light, & good der and diftoskirmishand fight afar offibut when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great were. vantage of them. As for the order of their battels, they knew not what it meant, nor to cast the sclues into a snaile or ring, but only vsed the square battell, nor yet gaue it any such front where the pikes of many rankes might push together, and where the fouldiers might stand so close, that their targets should touch one another, as they do in the squadron of the battell of the Ma-CEDONIANS: by reason whereof, they were soone broken and ouerthrowne. Philopamen reformed all this, perswading them to vse the pike and shield, in stead of the litle target, speare, or bore-staffe, and to put good morrians or burganets on their heads, corsclets on their bodies, and good taffes and greaues to couer their thighes & legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not giving a foote of ground, as light armed men runne to and fro in a skirmish. And thus having perswaded and taught the yong men to arme themselues throughly, first he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had bene men that could not have bene ouercomenhen he turned all their vaine superfluous charge, into necessary and honest expences. But he could not possibly bring them altogether from their vaine and rich apparell they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceed another: nor from their sumptuous furniture of houses, as in beds, hangings, curious seruice at the table, and delicate kind of dishes. But to begin to withdraw this defire in them, which they had to be fine and delicate, in all superfluous & vnnecessaric things, and to like of things necessarie and profitable: he wished them to looke more nearesty menturned to their ordinarie charge about themselves, taking order as well for their apparell, as also for all curioftheir diet, and to spare in them, to come honourably armed to the field, for defence of their tie and daintie countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the gold-smithes shoppes, ye should have fare into feene nothing else in their hands, but breaking and battering of pots of gold and filuer, to be brane and cast and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targets, and filtering of bits.

Battell

In the shew-places for the running of horses, there was managing and breaking of yong horses, and young men exercising armes. Womens hands also were full of morians and head peeces. whereto they tied goodly braue plumes of feathers of fundry colours, and were also full of imbrodered arming coates and caffocks, with curious and very rich workes. The fight of which brauery did heave vp their hearts; and made them gallant and lively: fo as enuy bred straight in them who should do best service, and no way spare for the warres. Indeed, sumptuousnesse and brauery in other fights, doth secretly carry mens minds away, & allure them to seeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womanish persons: because this sweet tickling and inticing of the outward sence, that is delighted therewith, doth straight meltand soften the strength and courage of the mind. But againe, the sumptuous cost bestowed vpon warlike surniture, doth incourage and make great a noble heart. Euen as Homer saith it did Achilles, when his mother brought him new armour and weapons she had caused Vulcan to make for men: minas to ferue no. him, and layed them at his feete: who feeing them, could not tarrie, but was straight set on fire with defire to occupy them. So when Philopamen had brought the youth of Achara to this good paffe, to come thus brauely armed and furnished into the field, he began then to exercise them continually in armes: wherein they did not only show themselues obedient to him but did moreouer striue one to excell another, and to do better then their sellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battel he had taught the, because that standing so close together as they did, they thought furely they could hardly be ouerthrown. Thus by continuance of time, being much vied to weare their armour, they found them a great deale casier and lighter then before, beside the pleasure they tooke to see their armour so braue, and so rich: insomuch as they longed for some occasion to trie them straight upon their enemies. Now the ACHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACED EMON, who fought by all deuice he could with a great army, to become chiefe Lord of al the Peloponnesians. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrey of the Mantineans, *Philo*pamen ftraight marched towards him with his army: fo they met both not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themselues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of strangers to serue them, besides the whole force of their country; and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his strangers gaue such a lusty charge vpon certaine flingers and archers, being the forclorne hope whom Philopamen had put before the battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmish, that he ouerthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he should have gone on directly against the Achaians that were ranged in battell ray, to have proued if he could have broken them, he was very bufie and earnest fill to follow the chase of them that first fled, & so came hard by the Achaians that stood stil in their battell, and kept their rankes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many menthought the Achaians were but cast away. But Philopamen made as though it had bene nothing, and that he fet light by it; and fpying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the fpurre, whom they had ouerthrowne, and ftaying fo farre from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and the field open vpon them he did not make towards them to ftay them, nor did ftriue to ftop them that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered them to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his men march vpon the LACED EMONIANS, whose sides were naked, having no horsemen to gard them: and so did set vpon them on the one side, and ranne so hastily on them to win one of their flankes, that he made them flie, and slue withall a great number of them. For it is said, there were foure thousand LACED EMONIANS slaine in the field, because they had no man to leade them. And moreouer, they say they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the field, when they saw Machanidas chasing stilthose vpon the fpurre, whom he had ouerthrowne. After this Philopamen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chase with his strangers. But by chance there was a great broad dirch betweenethem, fo as both of them rode vpon the bankes fide of the fame, a great while together, one against another of them the one side seeking some convenient place to get over and slie, and the other fide feeking meanes to keepe them from starting away. So to fee the one before the other in this fort, it appeared as they had bene wilde beafts brought to an extremitie, to defend themselues by force, from so fierce a hunter as Philopamen was. But whilest they were striuing thus, the tyrants horse that was lustie and couragious, and felt the force of his masters spurres pricking in his fides, that the bloud followed after, did venture to leape the ditch, coming to the hankes fide, frood ypon his hindmost legs, & advanced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other fide. Then Simmias and Polyanus, who were about Philopamen when he fought, ran thither straight to keepe him in with their borestaues that he should not leape the ditch. But Philopamen who was there before them, perceiuing that the tyrants horse, by lifting vp his head to high, didcouer all his mafters body for fooke by and by his horse, & tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyrant with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory Philogawherof, the ACHAIAN's that did highly effecme this valiant act of his, and his wifedome also in Mathage leading of the battell, did fet up his image in braffe in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in dee. the forme he flue thetyrant. They fay that at the affembly of the common games called Nemea. (which they folemnize in honour of Hercules; not farre from the citie of AR GOS) and not long after he had won this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second time of the tribe of the Acharans, & being at good leafure also by reason of y feast; he first shewed althe Gracians that were come thither to fee the games & pastimes, his army ranged in order of battell, and made them fee how eafily they removed their places cuery way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their rankes, and that with a maruellous force and readinesse. When he had done this he went into the Theater to heare the Musitians play and fing to their inftruments, who should win the best game, being accompanied with lustie young gentlemen apparelled in purple cloakes, & in skarlet coates & cassocks they wore vpon their armor being all in the flower of their youth, and well given & disposed: who did greatly honor & renerence their Captaine, & befides that shewed themselues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable battels they had fought, in which they had ener attained \u00ed victory, & gorten the upper hand of their enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the Musician, singing certaine poems of Timotheus, called the Perfes, fell into these verses:

O Greekes, it is even he, which your prosperitie Hath given to you; and therewithall a noble libertie.

When he had sweetly fung out aloud these noble verses, passingly well made, the whole assembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to fee the games, cast all their cycs straight vpon Philopamen, and clapped their hands one to another for ioy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soone recouer their ancient reputation: and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy minds of their ancestours. And as young horses that do alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinary riders, if any stranger get vp on their backes, do straight waxe strange to be handled, and make great ado: euen so when the Achaias came to any dangerous battell, their hearts were even done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopamen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they faw him, ever the whole army rejoyced, and defired straight to be at it, they had such confidence in his valiantnesse and good fortune: and truely not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand before him: because they were afraid to heare his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip King of MACEDON (imagining that if he should find meanes to dispatch Philopamen out of the way, how societ it were, the A-CHAIAN'S would straight take part againe with him) sent men secretly into the city of Ar GOS, to kil him by treason; howbeit the practise was discouered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the Grecians generally, and taken for a wicked and cowardly Prince. It fortuned one day when the Bosorians layed fiege to the city of Megara, and thought certainely to have won it at the first affault, there rose a rumor suddenly amongst them, that Philopamen came Theonele to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a falle report. Notwithstan-name of ding, the Bo E or I ANS were fo feared, that for feare they left their fealing ladders behind them, Philippe which they had fet against the walles, to have scaled the towne, and fled straight to faue themfelues. Another time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACED EMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had sians flie taken the city of Massina vpon a fudden: Philopamen being then a private man, and having no for foote. charge of souldiers, went vnto Lysippus Generall of the Achaians that yeare, to perswadehim ranos Lathathe would send present aide vnto the of Messina. Lysippus told him, it was too late now to cod more than the world send present aide vnto the of Messina. go thither, and that it was but a loft towne, not to be holpen: confidering the enemies were in it size of already. Philopamen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himselfe with the Moffine. force of Messina onely, not staying for the assembly of the Megalipolitans, that were in counsel about it, to give them commission by voyces of the people to take him with him; but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthieft of all other to command them. Now when he came nere vnto MESSI-NA, Nabis hearing of his coming, durst not tarrie him, though he had his army within the city, but stole out at another gate, and marched away in all the hast he could, thinking himselfe a happy man if he could so scape his hands, and retire with safety, as indeed he did. And thus was Messina by his meanes deliuered fro captiuity. All that we haue written hitherto concerning red the car Philopamen, falleth outdoubtleffe to his great honour and glory; but afterwards he was greatly of Mellian dispraised for a journey he made into CRETA, at the request of the GORTYNIANS, who sentto pray him to be their captaine, being fore troubled with warres at that time. Because Philopamen went then to serue the Goatynians, when the tyrant Nabis had greatest wars with the MEGA-LIPOLITANS in their own coutry, they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flie the wars. rmenger or else that he fought honour out of season with forraine nations, when his poore citizens the isurnspinto MEGALIPOLITANS were in such distresse, that their countrey being lost and destroyed, they were driuento keepe them within their city, and to fow all their void grounds and streets in the same with corne, to sustaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hard at their ownegates. And the rather, because himselfe making wars with the CRETANS, and seruing strangers beyond the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tarry to fight for defence of his own country. Againe, there were that faid, because the Achaians didchuse other for their Generall, that he being a privat man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had marnellously intreated him to take the charge; for he was a man that could not abide to line idselv. and that defired specially about all things to serve continually in the wars, and to put in practise his skill & discipline in the leading of an army. The words he spake one day of king Ptolomie do witnesse as much: for when there were some that praised king Ptolomie highly, saying that he trayned his army well, and that he still continued his person in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (faid he) of his yeares, to delight intraining his men to exercise armes, but to do some act himselfe in person. Well, in the end, the MEGALIPOLITANS tooke his absence in such euill part, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needs have banished him, & put him from the freedome of the city : had not the ACHAIANS fent their Generall Aristaneus vnto them who would not fuffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the commonwealth. Afterwards Philopamen perceiuing his countrymen made no more account of him, to spite them withall, he made divers small villages and cities rebell against them, and taught them to say, and to giue it out, that they were not their subjects, neither paid them tribute fro the beginning; and he made them stand to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the citie of MEGALIPOthe Mogd. LIS, before the counfell of the ACHAIANS. These things hapned shortly after. But whilest he made wars in Crefa for the Gortynians, he shewed not himselfa Peroponnesian, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open wars: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vse their own policies, fine deuices, and ambushes against themselues. And made them know also, that all their crasts were but childish sports as it were, in respect of those that were deuised, & put in execution, by a wise experienced captain, and skilful to fight a battell. So Philopamen, hauing won great fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned again to PELOPONNEsvs, where he found, that Philip king of MACEDON had bin ouercome in battel, by T.Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAIAN'S loyning with the ROMAINS, did make war against the tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made General immediatly vpon his return, and gaue him battel by sea. In the which it seemed he fel into like missortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell falling out much worse with him then was looked for, in respect of his former courage and valiantnes. But as for Epaminondas, fome fay he returned willingly out of Asia, & the Hes, without any exploit don, because he wold not have his courrime fleshed with spoile by sea, as searing lest of valiant foldiers by land, they wold by litle & litle (as Plato faid) become diffolute mariners by sea. But Philopamen cotrariwise, presuming on the skil he had to set the battell in good order by lad, wold needs take vpo him to do the fame by fea. But he was taught to his cost, to know what exercise & experiece meant, & how strong it makeththe that are practised in things. For he lost not only the battel by sea, being viskilful of that service; but he comitted besides a fouler error.

pied in 40. yeares together; & embarked his countrymen into the same, which were all likely to perish, because the ship had diverse leakes, by fault of good calking. This overthrow made his enemies despise him vtterly, perswading theselues he was fled for altogether, & had gine thesearoome: whereupon they laid fiege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopamen being aduertifed there. Naturbiof, imbarked his men fuddenly, and fet vpon his enemies ere they wift it, or had any thought of it of 69. his coming : and found them stragling vp and downe, without watch or guard, by reason of thism. the victory they had lately won. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set fire vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it every whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, flue agreat number of them. Shortly after this stealing vpon them, the tyrant Nabis also stole vpon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill and dangerous way: which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the first, thinking it vnpossible for them that they could ever scape that danger, confidering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopemen bethinking himselfe, and considering the nature and situation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainely then, that the chiefest point of a good fouldier and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, according to the time and situation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battel a litle, and forced it according to the fituation of the place, where in he was compassed; and by doing this without trouble or businesse, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in such fierce wise, that in a short time he put them all to flight. And when he perceived that they did not flie all in troupes together towards theci-Philopaty, but feathering wife, abroad in the fields in energy place, he caused the trumpet to found theretraite. Then he commanded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the country there- bistrant about was full of thicke woods and groues, very ill for horsemen; and also because there were of Lacedsmany brookes vallies and quauemires, which they flould paffe ouer he encamped himselfprefently, being yet broadday. And so, fearing lest his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he fent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in ambush amongst the brookes and hils neare about it, which made great slaughter of Nabia fouldiers, because they came not altogether introopes, but scatteringly one after another as they fled, one here another there, and so fell into their enemics hands, as birds into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopamen singularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters & comon affemblies. Whereat T. Q. Flaminius, of nature very ambi- Time Quin. tious & couctous of honor, did much repine, & was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Con-time enuiful of Rome shold have place & honor among the Achaians before a mean gentleman of Ar - pamen. CADIA. And he imagined he had deferued better of all GRECE, then Philopame had confidering how by the only proclamatio of an herald, he had restored GRECE again to her ancient liberty, which before his coming was fubicat to king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwards, T. Quinitus made peace with the tyrat Nabis, who was shortly after very traiter oully slain by the Wabis sain ETOLIANS. Wherupon the city of Sparta grew to a tumult, & Philopemen straight taking the by the Eoccasió, went thither with his army, & handled the matter so wisely, that partly for loue, & partly tollan. by force, he wan the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the Achaians. So was he maruelloufly comended & esteemed of the Achaians for this notable victory, to have wontheir tribe and comunalty fo famous a city & so great estimation. For the city of Sparta was no smal increase of their power, being joyned as a meber of Achaia. Moreouer he wan by this meanes the loue & goodwil of althe honest men of LACEDEMON, for the hope they had to find him a protector and defendor of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis house and goods were sold, as forfeited to the flate; they refolued in their counfell to make him a prefent of the money thereof, which amounted to the fum of fixescore talents, and sent ambassadours purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopamen shewed himselfe plainely to be no counterfeit honest man, but they made one Timolaus to take the matter upon him, who was his familiar friend, and also his host. And yet the same Timolaus when he came vnto MEGALIFOLIS, and was lodged & entertained in Philopames house, did so much reverence him for his wise talke and conversation, for his moderate dier, & inst dealing with all ment hat he saw there was no likely possibility to cora good man indeed. For first of all, there was not one of all the Laced Emonians that durst monster. prefume to offer him this mony, but every man was afraid to tell him of it;and every body that from comewas appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for themselves. Notwithstanding, in the end soussession rupt him with money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, but found some other occasion to excuse the cause of his coming vnto him. And being fent vnto him again the second time, he did euen as much as at the first time. And making a third proofe, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the goodwill the city of Sparta did beare him. Philopamen became a glad manto heare it; and when he had heard all he had to fay to him, he went himfelf vnto the city of Sparta. There he declared vnto the counfell, that it was not honest men and their good friends, they should seeke to winne and corrupt with money, confidering they might command their vertue vpon any occasion, without cost vnto them; but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by seditious orations in councell did mutine, and put a whole city in vprore: to the end that having their mouths stopped with gifts, they should trouble them the lesse in the comonwealth. For faid he, it is more necessary to stop your enemies mouths, & to fow vp their lips from liberty of speaking, then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopamen against all couctousnesse of mony. Shortly after, the LACEDEMONIANS beginning to stir again, Diophanes (who was then general of the Acharans) being aductifed of it, began to prepare to punish the. The Laced Monians on the other fide preparing for the wars, did fet all the country of Pe-LOPONNE SVS in armes. Hereupon Philopamen fought to pacific Diophanes anger, declaring vato him, that king Antiochus, and the Romaines, being at wars, together at that present time, and they both having puissant armies one against another in the middest of GRECE, it was meet for a good generall and wife gouernor, to have an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his country at that instant; but the rather to diffemble it, & not to feeme to heare any fault what foeuer they did. Diophanes would not be perswaded, but entred the territories of LACED EMON with a great army, & T. Quintius Flaminius with him : and they together marched directly towards the city of Sparta. Philopæmen was fo mad with their doings, that he took vpon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iust:neuerthelesse his attempt proceeded of a noble mind & great courage. For he got into the city of Sparta, and being but a private person, kept out the general lof the Achaians, and the Conful of the ROMAINS for entring the city: and when he had pacified all troubles and seditions in the same, he deliucred it vp again as it was before, into the hands of the communalty of the Achaians. Neuertheles himfelte being afterwards general of the Achaians, did compel mess cruel- the Laced Emonians to receive those home again whom they had banished for certain faults, & did put 80 naturall borne citizens of Spart a vnto death, as Polybius Writeth: or 350, as Ariftocrates another historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and razed them to the ground, and took away the most part of their territories, and gaue them to the ME-GALIPOLITANS. All those whom the tyrants had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the country of LACED EMON, and forced them to dwel in ACHAIA, three thoufand onely excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all those he sold for flaues, and with the money he made of them (to spite them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the city of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACED EMONIANS all the mischiefe he could, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their most grieuous miserie, he dida most cruell and vniust act toward them. For he compelled them to leaue the discipline and manner of education of their children, which Lyeurgus had of old time inftituted; and made them to follow the maner the Achains vsed, in lieu of their old grounded countrey custome, because fair Lycure he faw they would neuer be humble minded, folong as they kept Lycurgus order and institution. Thus were they driven to put their heads in the coller, by the miserable mishap that befell them : and in all despite, to suffer Philopamen in this manner to cut as under (as it were) the sinewes of their comonwealth. But afterwards they made fute to the Romains, that they might be suffered to enioy their ancient discipline againe, which being granted them, they straight left the maner of the Achaians, and did fet vp againe as much as was possible (after so great miserie and corruption of their maners) their old ancient customes & orders of their country. Now about the time the wars began in GRECE betweene the ROMAINE's and king Antiochus, Philofamen was then a private man, and without any authority. He feeing that king Antiochus lay still in the city of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feast and loue, and had maried a young maid farre vnmeete for his yeares: & perceiuing that his Syrian fouldiers wandred vp & down the towns ingreat diforder, playing many lewdeparts without guide of Captaines, he was very fory he was not at that time Generall of the Achaians, and told the Romaines, that he enuied their victoric, having warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For faid he) if Fortune fauoured me that I were Generall of the Achaians at this present, I would have killed memicounthem every man in the cellars and tippling houses. Now when the Romaine s had overcome fit against Antiochus, they began to haue furer footing in GRECE, and to compasse in the ACHAIANS On mainet. all fides, and specially, by reason the Heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the Romaines, to win their fauour. And now their greatnesse grew in hast, by the fauour of the gods, so as they were become the monarch of the whole world, who brought them now to the end that Fortune had determined. Philopamen in the meane time did like a good pylot, refifting against the billowes and roughnesse of the waves. And though for the time he was forced to giue place, and to let things paffe, yet for all that he was against the Romains, and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by seeking ever to defend the liberty of those, who by their cloquence and well doing carried great authority among the Achaians, And when Mristantus Magalipolitan, (aman of great authoritie among the Achaians, and one that ener bare great denotion to the ROMAINES) faid in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they should denie the Romaines nothing, nor shew themselves vnthankfull to them: Philopamen hearing what he faid, held his peace a while and fuffered him to speake (though it bojled in his heart, he was so angry with him) and in the end, breaking all patience, and as one ouercome with choler, he said: Aristanetus, why haue you such haste to see the vnfortunate end of GRECE? Another time when Manius Confull of Rome (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the councell of the Achaians, that such as were banished from LACED AMON, might return home into their country againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnestly intrearthem: Philopæmen was against it, not for any harred he bare vnto the banished men, but because he would have done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES. Afterwards he himselfe, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did restore them wholy to their owne againe. Thus was Philopamen sometime a litle too bold and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomack: & specially when any man sought for to have things by authority. Lastly, being threescore & ten yeares of age, he was y eight time chosen General of the ACHAIANS, and hoped well, not only to passe the years of his charge in peace and quietnesse, mentions. but also all the rest of his life without any stir of new wars, he saw the affaires of GRECE take so she sight good fuccesse. For like as the force and strength of sicknesse declineth, as the natural strength of time Grant of the Gallack the fickly body impaireth: fo through all the cities & people of GRECE, the defire of quarrel & the Athab of wars furceased, as their power diminished. Neuertheles, in the end of his yeares gouernment, the gode division of the gode division the gods divine (who iustly punish all insolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as of they suffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall of his horse, being come almost to the end of his cariere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good company, where one was maruellously praised for a good captaine, said vnto them: Why masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken prisoner aliue of his enemies. Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a private enemie of Philopamens for certaine controversies past betweene them, and a man generally hated befides of all honourable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawne the city of Messina from the denotion of the Achai-ANS : and moreover, that he came with an army to take a town called Colonide. Philepemen was at that time in the city of AR GO's, sicke of an Ague, & yet hearing these newes, took his iorncy towards MEGALIPOLIS, making all the haste he could possible, for that he came about 4. Thiopahundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence towards MBSSINA, and taried not, but my against tooke with him a company of men at armes of the lustiest and wealthiest MB GALIPOLITANS: Dinocrates. who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered themselues to go with him for the goodwill they bare him, & for the defire they had to follow his valiantnes. Thus went they on their way towards the city of Massina, & marched fo long, that they came neare to the hill of Euander, where they met with Dinecrates and his company, and gaue so fierce an onset on the that they made them all turne taile:howbeit in the meane while; there came a relecte of 500 men wanter. to Dinocrates, which he had left to keepe the countrey of MBSSINA. The flying men that were scattered here and there, seeing this supply, gathered themselues againe together, and shewed vpon the hils. Philopamen fearing to be enuironed, & being defirous to bring his men fafe home and taking the cup in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen that body being brought follow, and thereupon the poison wrought his effect, and rid him straight victory. For the foldiers were all crowned with garlands of laurel in token of victory, notwithstanding, the teares ran downe their cheekes in token of sorow, and they led their enemies prifoners, shackled and chained. The funerall-pot in the which were Philopamens ashes, was so coucred with garlands of flowers, no legayes, & laces, that it could feant be seene or discerned, and was carried by one Polybius a young man, the fon of Lycortus, that was General at that time to the

ACHAIANS; about whom there marchedall the noblest & chiefest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the fouldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so forowful in their countenance, as they are commonly which have great cause of so-row:nor yet fo ioyful, as those that came conquerors fro so great a victory. Those of the cities, towns, & villages in their way as they past, came and presented themselves vnto them, to touch the funerall-pot of his ashes, even as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALIPOLIS: at the gates whereof, were old men, women and children, which thrusting thefelues amongst the souldiers, did renew there ares, sorrowes, & lamentations of all the miserable and vnfortunate citie: who took it that they had lost with their citizens, the first & chiefest place of honour among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him:

and the other priloners of Messina, were all stoned to death, about his sepulcher. Al the other cities of Achaia, besides many other honours they did vnto him, did set vp statues, as like to him as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the ynfortunate time of GRECE, when the citie of tweene duty and profite: and did thinke honestic and profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason & instice. Moreouer they were perswaded, that like as men receiue courtesie and goodnesse of any, so are they bound to requite them againe with kindnesse and dutic. And as men vse to acknowledge the same ; euen so ought men to honour and reuerence vertue.

And thus much for the life of

came with him, specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them Philosas were faucd. Then he cast his hands a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him, he said: It is mensiast againe, who most of loue had followed him: began to march away through narrow bushy places, himself being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmished with them, onely to drive them away from following of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set vpon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopamen fundry times venturing farre from his company, to giue these young noble men leasure to saue themselues one after another tooke no heede to himselfe that he was alone enuironed on euerie fide with a great number of enemics. Notwithstanding, of all his enemies there was not a man that durst come to handstrokes with him, but still slinging and shooting at him a farre off, they draue him in the end amongst stony places between e hewne rocks, where he had much ado to guide his horse, although he had spurred him that he was alof a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not let him but he might have faued himselfe; for he was strong and lustie by the continual exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe his body being weake with ficknesse, and wearie with the long iourney he had made that day, he found himselfe very hea-uie & ill disposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer stirred nor spake: so that his enemies thinking he had bene dead, came to turne his bodieto strip him. But when they faw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vpon him and tooke him, and bound both his hands behind him, and did all the villany and mischiefe they could vnto him, and fuch, as one would little haue thought Dinocrates would have vfed in that fort, or that he could have had such an ill thought towards him. So they that tarried behind in the city of Messina, were maruellous glad when they heard these newes, and ran all to the gates of the citie to fee him brought in. When they faw him thus shamefully bound and pinioned, against the dignitic of so many honours as he had received, and of so many triumphs & vi-Ctories as he had passed: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the mishap and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so litle certainetie, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there fome courteous speech to run in the mouthes of the people by litle & litle that they should rememberthe great good he had done them in times past, and the liberty he had restored them vnto, when he expulled the tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, said they should hang him on a gibbet, & put him to death as a dangerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him; and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dinocrates then euer he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiving such open shame by him. Neuerthelesse, in the end they carried h im into a certaine dungeon under the ground, called the Treasurie, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor doore, nor halfe doore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these young noble Achaian horsemen had sled vpon the spurre a great way from the enemy, they remembred themselues, and looked round about for Philopamen: and finding him not in fight, they supposed straight, he had bene slaine. Thereupon they staid a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he answered not, they began to fay among themselues, they were beasts and cowards to fly in that fort: and how they were dishonoured for euer so to have for saken their Captaine, to save themselves, who had not ipared his owne life to deliuer them from danger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring still for him, they were in the end aduertised how he was taken. And then they went and carried those newes through all the towns and cities of ACHAIA, which were very forry for him, and tooke it as a figne of great ill fortune toward them. Wherupon they agreed to fend ambaffadors forthwith to the MESSINIANS, to demand him: and in the meane time enery man should prepare to arme themselues to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAIANS had thus sent, Dinocrates feared nothing so much, as that delay of time might sauce Philopamens life: wherefore to preuent it, as soone as night came, and that the people were at rest, he straight caused the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philapamen with a cup of poison to offer him, who was commanded also not togo from him, vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopamen laid on the ground upon a litle cloake, having no lift to fleepe, he was so gricuously troubled in his mind. Who when he faw light, and the man standing by him, holding a cup in his hand with this poison, he sate vpright vpon his couch, how beit with great paine, he was so weak:

wel feeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith speaking no mo words, nor making other ado, words. he drunke vp all the poison, and laid him down as before. So nature stroug not much withal, his out of his paine. The news of his death ran presently through all Achara, which generally fro Philopor high to low was lamented. Whe rupon althe Achaian's youth & counsellers of their cities & meni diath towns, affembled themselues in the city of Megalipolis, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their General, under whose conduct they inuaded The Achair the Messinians, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and fword: fo as the Messinians were fo feared with this mercilesse furie, that they yeelded themselves and wholly con-lopament fented to receive the Achaians into their citie. But Dinecrates would not give them lefture to death, execute him by iustice, for he killed himselfe; and so did all the rest make themselues away, who gaue aduise that Philopamen should be put to death. But those that would have had Philopamen selfe. hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused them to betaken, which afterwards were put to death with alkind of torments. That done, they burnt Philopames body, & did put his affies into a pot. Then Philopames they straight departed from Messina, not in disorder, one vponanothers necke as every man mensione listed but in such an order & ray, that in the middest of the funerals; they did make a triumph of ras.

CORINTH was burnt & destroyed by the Romain's, there was a malicious Romaine that did what he could to have the same pulled downeagaine, by burdening and accusing Philopamen (as humanitie if he had beneyer aliue) that he was alwayes enemie to the Romaines, and enuied much their of the Romaines. prosperitie and victories. But after Polybius had answered him, neither the Consult Mummius, keeping nor his counsellors, nor lieutenants, would suffer them to deface & take away the honors done their enein memory of fo famous and worthy a man, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto ment from ment from Titus Quintius Plaminius, and vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a difference be-defacing.

Titus Quintius Flaminius.

T is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme and stature, by Philopamen statue of brasse, to whom we compare him; the which is now fet vp at Rome, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CAR-THAGE, and is placed right against the coming into the shew-place, vnder which there is an infcription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they fay of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleafure men againe. For if he did punish any man that had angred him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good alfo to many, and euer loued them whom he had once pleafured, as if they had done him some pleasure: and was readie to do for them fill whom he found thankfull, because he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honourable a thing as he could purchase to himselfe, because he greatly sought honour aboue all things, when any notable feruice was to be done, he would do it himselfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with the that needed his helpe, then with those that could help him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to excrcise his vertue with the other, he took them as his fellowes and followers of honor with him. He came to mans state, when the city of Rom had greatest warres and trouble: At that time all the youth of Rome, which were of age to carie weapon were sent to the war to learne to traile thepike, and how to become good captaines. Thus was heentred into martiall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousand footenen, under Marcellus the Confull; who being flaine by an ambufly Hannibal had laid for him between the cities of BANCIA and VENVSA, then they did chuse Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernour of the province and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the fecond time. In this gouernment of his, he wanne the reputation as much of a good and fust man, as he did of an expert and skilfull captain. By reason whereof, when the Ro-MAINES were requested to fend men to inhabite the cities of NARNIA and Cossa, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefly gaue him heart and courage to afpire at the first to che Consulship, passing ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by degrees) other yong men were wont to attaine the Confulfhip. Therefore when the time came that the Confuls should be elected, he did present himselfe among other accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earnest sure for him. But the two Tribunes Fulnius & Manlius, spake against him, and faid: it was out of all reason, that so yong a man should in such manner prease to have the office of the highest dignitic, against the vse and custome of Rome, before he had passed through the inferiour offices of the common wealth. Neuertheleffe, the Senate preferred it wholy to the voices of the people: who prefently pronounced him Confull openly, with Sextins Elius, al- T. Fla. though he was not yet thirtie yeares old. Afterwards, Alius and he deutiding the offices of the services A. ftateby lot, it fel vpon T. Quintius to make war with Philip king of MACE DON. In the which me list coffets, thinkes fortune greatly fauoured the ROMAINS affaires, that made such a man General of these T.Q. Flawars: for, to have appointed a Generall that by force and violence would have fought all things kelb warre at the Macedonian's hands, that were a people to be won rather by gentlenes & perswasions, with Philip then by force and compulsion: it was all against themselves. Philip to maintaine the brunt of a hardon. battell against the ROMAINEs, had power enough of his own in his Realme of MACEDON: but to make war any long time, to furnish himselfe with mony and victuals, to have a place & cities to retire vnto; and lastly, to have all other necessaries for his men and army, it stood him vponto get the force of GRECE. And had not the force of GRECE bene politically cut fro him, the wars against him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreover, GRECE (which never before bare the Romaine's any great good will) would not have dealt then so inwardly in friendship with them, had not their General bene (as he was) a gentle person; lowly and tractable, that wan them Thus commore by his wisedome, then by his force, and could both eloquently vter his mindto them, and the force, and could both eloquently vter his mindto them, and the Green his force and could both eloquently vter his mindto them. courtcoully also heare them speake, that had to do with him, and chiefly ministred instice, and equitie to every man alike. For it is not to be thought that GRECE wold otherwise so some have withdrawne themselues from the rule of those, with whom they were acquainted, and gouerned and have put themselves vnder the rule of strangers, but that they saw great instice and lenitie in them. Howbeit that may more plainely appeare by declaring of his acts, Titus was informed, that the Generals before him fent to the warre in Macedon (as Sulpitius, and Publius Inlins) vsed to come thither about the latter end of the yeare, and made but cold wars, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in another against Philip, & all to take some straight, or to cut off victuals: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarrying at home, confumed the most of their Consulship at Rome, in matters of gouernment, and so enjoyed the honour of their office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would let out to the wars, of intent to get another yeare ouer their heads in their office, that fpeding one yeare in their Cosulship at home, they might employ the other in the wars abroad. But Titus not minding to trisic out y half of his Consulship at Rome, & the other abroad in the wars: did willingly leaue al his honors & dignities, he might have enjoyed by his office at Rom B and befought the Senate that they wold appoint his brother Lucius Quintius lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he took with himself about three thousand old soldiers of those that had first overthrowne Asarubal in Spaine, and Hanibal afterwards in Afrike, under the conduct of Scipin, which yet were able to serue, and were very willing to go with him in his journey, to be the strength of his army. With this company he passed the seas without danger, & landed To sided in Epiros, where he found Publius Julius encamped with his army before King Philip, who of in Epiros. long time had lien in camp about the mouth of y river of Apfus, to keep their straight & passage Affast. which is the entry into Epirovs. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the natural force & hardnes of the place. Then Titus took the army of him, & sent him to Rome. Afterwards, himself went in person to view & cosider the nature of the costry, which was inthis fort. It is a long vally walled oneither fide with great high mountains, as those which The dewas nums fort. It is a long varity wanted offentier new wanged and managed the forest finished was a green for finished and so the vally of Tempe in The search; how beit it had no fuch goodly woods, nor green for first in the vally of Tempe in The search forests, nor faire medows, nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had but it was a great the country of the first side and being a search of the first side and being a search of the deep marith or quauemire, through the middest wherof the river called Apsus did run being in greatnesse & swiftnesse of streame, very like to the river of P B N E V s. The river did occupy al the ground at the feete of the mountaines, fauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, & a narrow straight path by the waters side, very vnhandsome for an army to passe that way, though they found not a man to keep the passage. There were some in the army that counfelled Titus to fetch a great compatie about by the country of Dassaretide, and by the city of Lyncvs, where the countrey is very plaine, and the way maruellous cafe. Howbeit he flood in great feare he should lacke victuals, if he staid far from the sea; and haply if he fell into any barren or leane countrey, (Philip refusing the battel, and purposing to flie) he should be constrained in the end to returne again towards the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherfore he determined to croffe the mountaines to fet vpon his enemies, & to proue if he could win the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the Romaine's forced to get up the hilles, they were received with darts, flings and flot, that lighted amongst them here & there:infomuch as the skirmish was very hote for the time it lasted, and many were slain and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the warre: for in the meane time there came certaine neat-heards of the countrey vnto Tius (who did vseto keep beasts on these mountaines) and told him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not; by the which they promifed to guide his army so, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bring them on the top of the mountaine. And because they might be affured that their words were true, they faid they were fent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chiefest man of the Epirors, who loued the Romains very wel, yet he fauoured them but vnderhand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and fo fent one of his captaines with them, with fourethousand footmen, and three hundred horsinen. The heard-men that were their guides, went before stil, fast bound, and the Romains followed after. All the day time the army rested in thick woods, & marched all night by moon light, which was then by good hap at the ful, Titus having fent the femen away, rested all the rest of his camp: fauing that fome dayes he entertained them with fome light skirmishes to occupie the enemie withal. But the same day, when his men that setched a compasse about, should come vinto the top of the mountaine about the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, and deuided them into three troupes: with the one of them he himselfe went on that fide of the river where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the fide of the hill. The Macedonians againe, they fhot luftily at them from the height of the hil, and in certaine places among fithe rockes they came to the fword. At the felfefame time, the two other troupes on either hand of him, did their endeuor likewise to get vp the hil, & as it were enuying one another, they climed vp with great courage against the sharp and steep hanging of the mountaine. When the Sun was vp, they might fee afarre off as it were, a certaine smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mists we see comonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could fee nothing, because it was behind them, & that the top of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The Romaines, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellowes they looked for. But when they law it increased stil more & more, and in such fort, that it darkned al the aire; then they did assure the sclues it was certainly the token their men did give them that they were come. Then they began tocric out, climing vp the hils with fuch a luftic courage, that they draue their enemies vp the hil stil, even vnto the very rough & hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellowes also that were behind the enemies, did antiwer them with like loud cries from the top of the mountaine; wherewith the enemies were fo aftonied, that they fled prefently vponit. Notwithstanding, there was not flaine aboue two thousand of them, because the hardnes and straightnes of the place did so guard them, that they could not be chafed. But the Romaines spoiled their camp, took all that they found in their tents, tooke also their flaues, and wan the passage into the mountaines, by the which they entred the country of Epirvs and did paffe through it so quietly, and with so great abstinence, that though they were far from their ships and the sea, and lacked their ordinary portion of corne which they were wont to have monthly, & that victuals were very scant with the at that time, yet they neuer took any thing of § country, though they found great store & plenty of all riches in it. For Titus was aduertised, that Philip passing by Thessalr, & slying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to set fire on their houses,& to leave those goods they could not cary away, by reason of the weight & vnhadsom cariage thereof, to the spoile of his fouldiers: & so (as it seemed) he left the whole country to the conquest of the Romains. Whereupon Titus looking consideratly to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the courty without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their own. So they taried not long to enjoy the benefit of their orderly & wife forbearing of the country. For, fo foone as they were entred THESSALY, the cities willingly yeelded themselues vnto them; and the GRECIANS inhabiting beyond the courry of THERMOPYLEs, did maruellously defire to see Titus, asking no other thing, but to put themselves vnto his hands. The Achaian's also on the other side, did renounce the league & alliancethey had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their counfell, to make war with him on the Romaines fide. And although the Erolians were at that time friends and confederates with the Romaines, and that they did shew themselves very louing to take their part in the wars: neverthelesse when they defired the Opvarians that they wold put their city into their hands, and were offered that it should be kept & defended from Philip they would not hearken thereto, but fent for Titus, and put themselves and their goods wholy into his protection. They say, that when king Pyrrus first saw the Romains army range in order of battell from the top of a hil, he faid: This order of the barbarous people fetting of their me in battell ray, was in of the not done in a barbarous maner. And those also that never had seene Titus before, & came for to Romaines speake with him: were compelled in a manner to fay as much. For where they had heard the Ma-CEDONIANS fay, that there came a captain of the barbarous people that destroyed al before him by force of armes, and fubdued whole countries by violence; they faid to the contrary, that they found him a man indeed young of yeares, how beit gentle, and courteous to looke on, and that fpake the Greek tongue excellently well, and was a louer only of true glory. By reason wherof they returned home maruellous glad, and filled all the cities & towns of GRECE with good wil towards him, & faid they had feene Titas the captaine, that would reftore them to their ancient liberty againe. Then it much more appeared, when Philip shewed himselfe willing to have peace and that Titus also did offer it him, and the friendship of the people of Rome, with these conditions that he wold leave y GRECTANS their whole liberties, & remove his garrifons out of their ciries and strong holds: which Philip refused to do. And thereupon all GRECE, and even those which favoured Philip, faid with one voicethat the Romaines were not come to make wars with them, but rather with the MACEDONIANS in fauour of the GRECIANS. Whereupon all GRECE came in, & offered themselves vnto Titus without compulsio. And as he passed through the country of Bobotta, without any flew at all of warres, the chiefest men of the citie of THEBES went to meet him: who though they took part with the king of MACEDON, because of a prinate man called Barchylelu, yet they would honour Titus, as those which were contented to keepe league and friendship with either side. Titus embraced them, and spake very courteously vnto them, going on his way stil faire and foftly, entertaining them sometime with one matter, and fometime with another, & kept the talke of purpose, to the end his souldiers being wearied, with iournying, might in the meane time take good breath and so marching on by litle and litle, he entredinto the city with them. Wherewith the Lords of THEBES were not greatly pleased, but yet they durft not refuse him, though he had not at that time any number of souldiers about him. When he was within THEBES, he prayed audience, and began to perswade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already, that they would rather take part with the Ro-MAINEs, then with the king of MACEDON. And to further Titus purpose, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the affebly, did help to exhort § Thebans very earnestly, that they wold do as Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeares, for the defirehe had (as was imagined) to shew Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and moue himselfe withall, that he swouned sodainely in the midst of his oration, whereby the rewme fell down so fast vpon him, that it took away his senses, so as he fell in a trance before them all, and few daies after was connected again by fea into Asia, where he lived not long after. In the mean King Attatime, the Bo E o TIAN'S came into the ROMAINS, & took their part. And Philip having fent Am- The Boni. baffadorsto Rome, Titusalfo fent thither of his men to folicite for him, in two respects. The an year one if the wars continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, Remaines, if the Senate did grant him peace; that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it Quinting with Philip: For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare least they would fend a armin. fuccefforto continue those wars, who should take the glory from him, & make an end of them. But his frieds made fuch earnest sute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he praied meither was there fet any other General in Titus place, but he stil cotinued his charge in these wars. Wherefore, so some as he had received his commission and authority from the Senate, he went ftraight towards THESSALY, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army aboue fixe and twenty thousand fighting men whereof the Ærolians made fixe thousand footemen, 384 and three thousand horsemen. King Philips army on the other side was no lesse in number, and they began to march one towards the other, vntil at the length they both drew neare the city of Scorvs A, where they determined to trie the battell. So neither they nor their men were afraid to see themselves one so neare another: but rather to the contrary, the Romains on the one side tooke greater heart and courage vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselues what great honor they should winto ouercome the Macedonians, who were so highly esteemed for their valiantnesse, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the MACEDONIANS on the other side also, taking the Romaines for other maner of soldiers then the Persians, beganne to have good hope if they might winne the field, to make King Philip more famous in the world, then cuer was Alexander his father. Titus then calling his men together, spake and exhorted them to stand to it like men, and to shew themselves valiant souldiers in this battell, as those which were to shew the proofe of their valiant nesse in the heart of GRECE, the goodlicst Theater of the world, and against their enemies of most noble same. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the speed he made, because they were both ready to ioyne, did get vp vnwares vpon a charnell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a little hill raised vp aboue the rest, and neare the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his souldiers, as all Generals do before they give battel. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they took it for an ill figne that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to speak vnto the, he of a coceit at the matter, did of himself deferre to give battel that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the South windes had blowne, the clouds were turned to a mist, and filled all the valley with a darke groffe thicke ayre, coming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field betweene both campes with a mist all the morning: by reason whereof the skouts on both fides that were fent to discouer what the enemies did, in very short time met rogether, and one gaue charge vpon another, in a place they call the dogges heads, which are points of rockes placed vpon little hilles one before another, and very neare one vnto another, which had bene called so because, they have had some likenesse of it. In this skirmish there were many changes, as commonly falleth out when they fight in such ill fauored stony places: for Sometime the ROMAINES fled, and the MACEDONIANS chased them: another time the MACE-DONIANS that followed the chase, were glad to flie themselues, and the ROMAINES who fled before, now had them inchase. This change and alteration came by sending new supplies still from both camps, to relieue them that were distressed and driuen to slie. Now began the mist to breake vp, and the aircto cleare, so that both Generals might see about them what was done in either camp:by reason whereof both of them drew on their army to the field and battel. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, from which they came to amaine to fet vpon the Romaines, and with fuch a fury, that the strongest & valiantest that could be, had never bin able to abide the front of their battel, so closely were they ioyned together, & their wall of pikes was fo strong. But on his left wing it was not so, because the ranks of his battell could not io yne so neare nor close target to target, the place being betwixt the hils and the rocks, where the battel was coming, so as they were copelled by reason of the straightnesse & vneuennesse of the ground, to leaue it open, and vnfurnished in many places. Titus finding that disaduantage, went from the left wing of his battell which he saw ouerlaid by the right wing of his enemies, and going fodainely towards the left wing of King Philips battell, he fet vpon the MACEDONIANS on that fide, where he faw they could not close their ranks in the front, nor joyne them together in the middest of the battel (which is the whole strength and order of the Macedonian fight) because the field was vp hill and downe hill and to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind, that onethronged and ouerlaid another. For the battel of the Macedonians hath this propertie, that so long as the order is kept close and ioyned together, it seemeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, and that they are fundred and not io yned together, it doth not only lose the force & power of the wholebody, but also of euery private souldier that fighteth partly by reafon of the diversity of the weapons wher with they fight, and partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing and ioyning together of their ranks & orders, which doth stay vp one another, more then doth ener y private fouldiers strength. So when this left wing of the MACEDONIANS was broken, and that they ran their way: one part of the Romains followed the chase, & the other ran to give a charge vpon the flanks of the right wing which fought yet, and they made great flaughter of them. Wherupon they now which before had the vantage began to tagger and breake, and in the end ran away as fast as the other did, throwing down their Quintim weapons: infomuch as there were flaine of them eight thousand in the field, and fine thousand our reame taken prisoners in their chase. And had not the fault bin in the Ærolians, Philip had not faued Philips are himselfe by flying as he did. For whilest the Romains had their enemies in chase, the Atoli-Mutmie ANS tarried, and rifled all king Philips campe, so as they left the ROMAINE's nothing to spoile because the artheir returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell and hot words between them, and one with another. But afterwards it angred Titus worse, challenging the honour of this victory to Romaines. themselves, because they gave it out through GRECE, that they alone had overthrown king Philip in the battell. So that in the fongs and ballades the Poets made in praise of this victory,

Is fled, more (wift then Harts do run, which are pursude in chase. The Poer was Alexus that made these verses forto sing, who did them in disgrace of king Philip, fallely increasing the number of his men which died in the battell, onely to shame and spite him the more:howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, because it was sung in enery place. For Philip laughed at it, and to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a fong to counterfeithis, as followeth:

This gibbet on this hill, which paffers by may marke, Was fet to hang Alcaus up withouten leaves or barke.

But Titus tooke it grieuously, who chiefly desired to be honoured amongst the GRECIANS, alessis. by reason wheroffrom that time forwards he dealt in the rest of his matters alone, without making account of the Erolians: wher with they were maruellous angry, and specially when he private received an ambassador from Philip, and gave eare vnto a treatie of peace which he offered. For grudge bethen they were fo netled against him, that they gaue it out through all GRECE, that Titus had Quintum fold peace ynto Philip, when he might altogether have ended the war, and veterly have destroy- and the ed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought GRECE into bondage. These slan. Atolians. derous reports and false tales which the ÆTOLIANS spread thus abroad, did much trouble the ROMAINES friends and confederates: but Philips selfe pulled this suspition out of their heads, when he came in person to require peace, and did submit himself wholly to the discretion of Titus and the Romaines. Titus then granted him peace, and delinered to him his realme of Ma- To Quinting CEDON, and commanded him he should give over all that he held in GRECE; and besides, that gradient he should pay one thousand talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by sea, sauing onely passes ten ships: and for affurance of this peace, he tooke one of his sons for hostage, whom he sent to Rome. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, & wisely did foresee the time to come. For then Hannibal of CARTHAGE (the great enemy of the Romaines) was banished out of his countrey, Haunibal and came to king Antiochus, whom he put in the head, and earnestly moued, to follow his good was with fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal so followed with these persuasions, by the line for the increase of his Empire. that king Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notable acts, whereby in the wars before he had attained the furname of Great, he began now to aspire to the monarchie of the whole world, and sought how to find occasion to make wars with the Romaines. So that if Titus (forefeeing that a far off) had not wifely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the wars of king Philip, & that these two the mightiest Princes of the world had iouned together against the city of Rome: then it had bene in as great trouble and danger, as euer it was before in the time of their wars against Hannibal. Howbeit, Titus having happily thrust in this peace betweene both wars, he cut off the warre that was present, before the other that was coming: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kings his last, and from the other his first hope. In the meane time the ten commissioners that were sent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide & affish him in the order of the affaires of GRECE, did counfell him to fet all the rest of GRECE at liberty, and onely to keepe in their hands with good garrison, the cities of CHALCIDE, of CORINTH, and of DEMETRIADE, to make fure that by practife they should not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then by Philip of the Arolians (that were the common flanderers of Titus proceedings) began openly to make these cities to rebell, and did summon Titus to loose the chaines of GRECE: for so did king Philip call the sethree cities. Then they asked the GRECIANS in mockery, whether they were willing now to have heavier fetters on their legs then before, being somewhat brighter and fairer then those they had bene shackled with: and also whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking offthe fetters from the GRECIANS legs, and tying them about their necks. Titus being maruellously troubled and vexed with this, moued the ten Counsellors so earnestly, that he made them grant his request in the end, that those three cities also should be deliuered from garrison: because the Grecians theneeforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not throughly performed and accomplished in every respect on them all. Wherfore when the feast called Isthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinit multitude of people, come to fee the foort of the games played there; for GRECE having bene long timetroubled with wars, they seeing themselves now in sure peace, & in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but delighted onely to see games, and to make merry. Proclamation was then made by found of trumpet in the affembly, that euery man should keepe silence. That done, the herald went forward, & thrust into the middest of the multitude, and proclaimed out aloud: that the Senate of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Consul of the people of Rome, (now that they had ouerthrowne king Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth discharge from all garrisons, and set at liberty from all taxes, subsidies, & impositions for euer, to line after their old ancient lawes, and in fulliberty: the Corinthians, the Lo-CRIANS, those of Phocide, those of the Iles of Évedea, the Achaians, the Phihiotes, the Magnesians, the Thessalians, and the Perro effiants. At the first time of the Proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herald, and the most part of those that heard him, could not tell directly what he faid: for there ran vp and down the shew-place where the games were plaid, a confused bruite and tumult of people, that wondered, and asked what the matter meant, so as the herald was driven againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after silence made, the herald putting out his voice far louder then before, did proclaime it in such audible wife, that the whole affembly heard him: and then rose there such a loud shout and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the found of it was heard to the sea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were fet to fee the Sword-players play, rose vp al on their feet, letting the games alone, and went together with great ioy to falute, to embrace, and to thanke Titus the recouerer, protector, and patrone of all their liberties of GRECE. Then was seene (which is much spoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crowes fell downe at that present time among the people, which by chance flew ouer the shew-place at that time that they made the same outshout. This came to passe, by reason the aire was broken and cut asunder with the vehemencie men poices and strength of the voyces, so as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe up the slying of the birds; which were driven of necessity to fall to the ground, as slying through a voide place where they lacked aire. Vnleffe we will rather fay, that it was the violence of the crie, which stroke the birds passing through the aire, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and so made them fal down dead to the earth. It may be also, that there was some hurling wind in y aire, as wedo fee fometime in the sea, when it riseth high, & many times turneth about the waves, by violece of the storme. So it is, that if Titus had not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to fee him, & that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended the had hardly escaped from being stifled amongst the the people came so thickeabout him fro every place. But after that they were weary of crying and finging about his paullion vntill night, in the end they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kin, friends or citizens, they did kiffe and embrace one another for ioy, and so supped and made merrie together. In their more reioycing yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the wars of GRECE, discoursing among the what fundry great wars they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they could never fo iovfully, nor more affuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that prefent, receiving the honorableft reward, and that which deferued greatest fame through the world that by the valiantnesse of strangers who fought for the same (without any spilt bloud of their owne in comparison, or that they lost the life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament they were so restored to their ancient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongst men, to find a man very valiant, and wife withall : but yet of all forts of valiant men, it is harder to find a just man. For Agesilaus, Lysander, Nicias, Alcibiades, and all other the famous captaines of former times, had very good skill to leade an army, and to win the battell, as well by fea as by land: but to turne their victories to any honourable benefite, or true honour among men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you do except the battell against the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battel of SALAMINA, the journy of Play EBs, the battel of THERMOPYLES, the battel Cimon fought about Cyprvs, and vpon the river of Eurymedon: all the other wars and battels of GRECE that were made, fell out against themselves, and did ever bring them into bondage; and all the tokens of triumph which euer were fet vp for the same, was to their shame and losse. So that in the end, GRECE was veterly destroyed and ouerthrowne, and that chiefly through the wickednesse and selfe-will of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying anothers doing. Where a strange nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to moue them to do it, (for that they had no great familiaritie with ancient GRECE, and through the counsell and good wisdome of the which, it should seeme very strange that GRECE could receive any benefite) have notwithstanding with dangerous battels and infinite troubles, delinered it from oppression and seruitude of violent Lords and tyrants. This and such like talke did at that time occupie the GRECIAN'S heads: and moreouer, the deedes following did answer and performe the words of the proclamation. For at one felfetime, Titus fent Lentulus into A- Quinting SIA, to fet the BARGILIANS at liberty, and Titilius into THRACIA, to remove the garrifons out the lot of the l of the Iles and cities which Philip had kept there; and Publius Iulius was fent also into As 1A, vnto liberty of king Antiochus, to speake unto him to set the GRECIANS at liberty which he kept in subjection. the Greek And as for Titus, he went himselfe vnto the citie of CHALCIDE, where he tooke sea, and and went into the province of Magnesia, out of the which he tookeall the garrifons of the ciries, and redeliuered the gouernment of the commonwealth vnto the citizens of the fame. After- The fad of wards when time came that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of AR GOS in the ho-Nema nour of Hercules, Titus was chosen judge and rector of the games that were plaid there; where, af-kpr at Arter he had fet all things in very good order, pertaining vnto the solemnitie of the feast, he caused againe folemne proclamation to be made openly, for the general liberty of all GRECE, Furthermore visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed instice, and did set the inhabitants & citizens of euery one of them in good peace, amitie and concord one with another; and did call home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, & pacified all old quarrels and diffentions among them. The which did no leffe please and content him, that by perswasions he could bring § GRECIANS to be reconciled one with the other, then if he had by force of armes ouercome the Macedonians. In somuch, as the recovery of the liberty which Titus had restored vnto the GRECIANS, seemed vnto them the least part of the goodnesse they had received at his hands. They fay that Lycurgus the orator feeing the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition, which the stran-theorator, gers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, resent and moreouer prosecuted law so hard against them, that he made them pay a fine for the iniurie the Philethey had done vnto fo worthy a person: And they tell, that the same Philosopher afterwards sopher, and meeting Lycurgus children in the city, said vnto them: I do well requite your fathers good turne [aned him he did me: for I am the cause that he is praised and commended of enery man for the kindnesse out he shewed on my behalfe. So the good deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintius Flaminius vnto the GRECIANS, did not only reape this benefite vnto them, in recompence that they were praised and honoured of all the world: but they were cause also of increasing their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the world afterwards had great affiance and trust in them, and that most justly. So that the people and cities did not onely receive the Captaines and Gouernours the Romaine's fent them: but they also went to Rome vnto them, and procuredthem to come, and did put themselues into their hands. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes also which were oppressed by other more mighty then themselues) had no other refuge, but to put themselues vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very short time (with the fauour and helpe of the gods, as I am perswaded) all the world came to submit themselues to their obedience, & vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more that he had restored GRECE againe vnto liberty, then in any other service or exploit he had cuer done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, the targets of filuer with his owne shield, he made these verses to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth:

O noble twins Tyndarides, Dan Ione his children deare, Throw out lowde (houts of ion and mirth reionce and make good cheere; O noble kings of Spartan soyle, which take delight to ride Your trampling steeds, with fomy bit, and trappings by their side: Reiogce you now, for Titus he, the valiant Romaine Knight, Thefe gifts fo great to you hath got, even by his force and might: That having taken cleane away from off the Greekish neckes, The heavy roke of fernitude, which held them thrall to checkes, Vnto their former liberty he hath restorde them free, Which altogether perisht was, as men might plainely see.

He gauea crowne of massie gold vnto Apollo, vpon the which he made this inscription to be written:

Why Quin

A valiant Romaine Knight, euen Titus by his name, I captaineworthy by desert of high renowne and fame: To thee (Apollo god) this crowne of pure fine gold Hath ginen, thy godhead to adorne with iewels manifold: Therefore let it thee please (Apollo god of grace) With fauour to requite this love to him and to his race: That his renowned fame and vertue may be spred,

And blazed through the world so wide, to show what life he led.

So hath the city of Corinth enjoyed this good hap, that the Greenans have bene twice proclaimed to be set at liberty: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time by Meroin our time, and at the felfe same instant when they solemnely kept the feast called Ishmia. fet Grace at Howbeit the first proclamation of their liberty (as we haue told you before) was done by the voice of an herald: & the fecond time it was done by Nero himself, who proclaimed it in an oration he made unto the people in open affembly, in the market place of the city of Corinth. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus began then a goodly and iust warre against Nabis the curfed and wicked tyrant of LACED & MON. Howbeit in the end he deceived the expectation of GRECE: for when he might have taken him, he would not do it, but made peace with him, for faking poore Sparta, vnworthily oppressed under the yoke of bondage: either because he was affraid that if the warre held on, there should come a successour vnto him from Rome; that should carry the glory away to end the same, or else he stood icalous and enuious of the ho-The bonour nour they did vnto Philopamen: who having shewed himselfe in every place as excellent a captaine as euer came in GRECE, and having done notable acts and famous service, both of great wisdome, and also of valiantnesse, and specially in the Acharans warre: he was as much honoured and reuerenced of the ACHAIANS in the Theater and common affemblies, cuenas Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruellously offended for he thought it vnreasonable that an Ar-CADIAN who had neuer bene Generall of an army, but in small litle wars against his neighbors, should be as much efteemed and honoured as a Confull of Rome, that was come to make wars for the recourry of the liberty of GRECE. But Titus alledged reasonable excuse for his doings, faying, that he faw very well he could not destroy this tyrant Nabu, without the great losse and misery of the other Spartans. Furthermore of all the honours the Acharans ever did him (which were very great) methinkes there was none that came neare any recompence of his honourable and well deferuing, but one only prefent they offered him, and which he aboue all the rest most esteemed: and this it was. During the second warres of Africke, which the Ro-MAINES had against Hannibal, many Romaines were taken prisoners in fundry battels they loft, and being fold here and there, remained flaues in many countries: and among ft other, there were dispersed in GRECE to the number of twelve hundred, which from time to time did move men with spite and compassion towards them that saw them in so miserable change and state Twelve of fortune. But then much more was their mifery to be pitied, when these captives found in the hundred ROMAINES army, some of them their sonnes, other their brethren, & the rest their fellowes and Romaines friends, free and conquerours, and themselues slaues and bondmen. It grieued Titus much to slaues. fee these poore men in such miserable captivitie, notwithstanding he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the Achaians redeemed and bought them for fine hundred pence a man, and having gathered them together into a troupe, they presented all The Adhai. the Romain captines vnto Titus, even as he was ready to take ship to returne into Ital Y. which med the present made him returne home with greater joy and contentation, having received for his noble deeds so honourable a recompence, and worthy of himselfe, that was so louing a man to his that were citizens and country. And furely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did most beautifie histriumph. Forthese poore redeemed captines did that, which the slaues are wont to Greece. do on that day when they be fet at liberty: to wit they shaue their heads, and do weare little Theserehats you them. The Romaines that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and so followed fluerman Titus chariot, on the day of his triumph and entry made into Rom n in the triumphing maner. It numified. was a goodly fight also, to see the spoiles of the enemies, which were caried in the snew of this T Quintin triumph: as ftore of helmets after the GRECIANS falhion, heapes of targets, shields, and pikes after the MACEDONIAN manner, with a wonderfull summe of gold and silver. For Itanus the Hiftoriographer writeth, that there was brought a maruellous great masse of treasure in niggots of gold, of three thousand seven hundred and thirteene pound weight; and of silver, of forty three thousand two hundred, threescore and ten pound weight; and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philips, four eteene thousand, fine hundred & four teene, besides the thousand talents king Philip should pay for a ransome: the which summe, the Romaines afterwards forgaue him, chiefly at Titus fute and interceffion, who procured that grace for him, & caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of Romm, and his son Demetrius to be sent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hoftage of Rome. Shortly after king Antiochus went out of Manius As 1 A into GRECE with a great fleet of ships, & a very puissant army, to stir vp the cities to for- Acids fake their league & alliance with the Romains, and make a diffention among them. To further Contains this his defire and enterprise, the Arolians did aide and backe him, which of long time had Liusenans borne great and secret malice against the Romains, and defired much to have had warres with sent suro them. So they taught king Antiochus to fay, that the war which he tooke in hand, was to fet the Gruce. GRECIANS at liberty, wherof they had no neede, because they did already enjoy their liberty: but for that they had no just cause to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he could. Wherfore the ROMAINE's fearing greatly the rifing of the people, and the rumour of the power of this great king, they fent thither Manius Acilius their Generall, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GRECIANS fakes. Which arrivall did more affure the that already bare goodwill to the ROMAINES, after they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that began to flie out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, remembring them of the friendship and good will they had borne him, euen like a good skilfull Phisitian that could giue his patient Phisicke to preserue him from a contagious disease. Indeede there were fome(but few ofthem) that left him, which were won & corrupted before by the ATOLIANS: and though he had iust cause of offence towards them, yet he saued them after the battell. For king Antiochus being ouercome in the country of THERMOPYLES, fled his way, & in great half tooke the feato returne into As 1 A. And the Conful Manius following his victory, entred into Amiechus the country of the ATOLIANS, where he took certaine townes by force, and left the other for a caeribrown prey vnto king Philip. So Philip king of Mace Don on the one fide, spoiled and sacked the Do-LOPIANS, the Magnesians, the Athanians, & the Aperantines; and the Confull Mamius on the other fide, destroyed the city of HERACLEA, and laid siege to the city of NAVPAC- Confull. TVM, which the ATOLIAN'S kept. But Titustaking compassion of them to see the poore people of GRECE thus spoiled and turned out of all: went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reproued him for suffering king Philip to vsurpe the benefit and reward of his honourable victory, still conquering many people, kings and countries, whilest he continued siege before a city, and onely to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwards, when they that were befieged faw Titus from their walls, they called him by his name, and held

withall. And thereupon peace was concluded betweene them vnder conditions: that Mithrida. ewint Sylla should depart from Asia the lesse, and from Paphlagonia, that he should restore Bithy-NIA VNto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA VNto Ariobar Zanes, that he should pay 2000 talents to the ROMAINES, and give them threescore and ten gallies, with all their furniture. And vpon behalfe vp. this, Sylla would also affure him the rest of his Realme: and would cause him to be proclaimeda friend of the Romaines. These articles being past by agreement betwixt them, sylla taking his iourney through THESSALY & MACEDON, into the country of HELLESPONT, carried Arche. laws with him, whom he honourably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerously ficke of a difease in the city of Larissa, he stayed there for him, and was very carefull to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefest Captaines and companions. And this was the cause that made Archelaus to be blamed for the battell of CHOERONEA, as if he had not faithfully fought itour. nor Syllatruly wonne it, but by treason. And againe, Archelaus was the more suspected, because Sylla redeliuered Mithridates all his fernants and friends which he had prisoners, fauing the ty-Arthoner- rant Aristion that kept ATHENS, whom he poyloned, because he was Archelaus enemy: but spea. cially for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this CAPPADOCIAN. For he gaue him ten thousand Iugera; ned by Silla (or acres of land) within the He of Eve of EA, and gaue him moreouer the title of a friend of the Romaines for euer. But sylla denyethall these things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambassadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their mafter did ratific and accept all the articles of peace, fauing that he only prayed him he wouldnot take the country of PAPHLAGONIA from him: and as for the gallies, he would not so muchas once say he would promise them. Sylla being offended herewith, angerly answered the againe Then Mithridates (as ye say) meaneth to keepe PAPHLAGONIA still, and refuseth to give the ships I demanded: where I looked that he would have humbly thanked me on his knees, if Heft him his right hand onely, with the which he put fo many Romaine citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me another tale, if I come once into Asia: but now at Per games, he speaketh his pleasure of this war which he hath not seene. The Ambassadours being afraid of his words, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and besought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hand. By intreatie, in the end he obtained of sylla to fend him vnto Mithridates: promifing that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles and conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill himselfe with his owne hands. Vponthis promife Sylla fent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armic into the countrey of MEDICA: and after he had destroyed the most part thereof, returned backe againe into MACEDON, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, found him neare vnto the city of PHILIPPES, bringing him newes that all should be well: howbeit that his master Mithridates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now the matter that made Mithridates so carnest to speake with sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who having flaine Flaccus the Confull, being of the contrary faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenants also, went himselfe against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, chose rather to make himselfe Syllaes friend. So Mithridates and Sylla mettogether in the countrey of TROADE, in the city of DARDANE, Mithridates being accompanied with a fleete of two hundred fale of shippes with oares at sea, with twenty thousand footenen, sixe thousand horse, and a number of armed carts with fithes befides by land, sylla having onely but foure enfignes of footmen, and two hundred horsemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hand: Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no answer. Sylla following on his tale, said vnto him: It is for furers to speake first, that have request to make: and for conquerours, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare whatthey will fay. Then began Mithridates to excuse himselse, and to lay the occasion of the warre, partly vpon the ordinance of the gods that so had appointed it, and partly also vpon the Romaines themselves. Whereunto Sylla replyed, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, feeing that helacked no comely words to cloke his foule and shamefull deedes: but withall he sharpely reproued him, and draue him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made eriobarga answer, that he did. Then Sylla faluted, embraced, and kissed him: and calling for the kings Nines king of antiverstriat ne did. I nero special them together, and made Mithridates their friend againe.

bow-men, he returned by sea into his realme of Pontvs. But Sylla hearing that his fouldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, because they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their most cruell and mortall enemie, (having in one selfeday canfed a hundred and fiftie thousand ROMAINE citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroad indiuers places of Asia) foto depart, and go his way fafe, with the riches and spoyles of the thousand country, which he had berefithem of, and yied at his pleasure, the space of forty yeares together answered them in excuse of himselfe, that he was notable to make warres with Mithridates, one day in and Fimbria both, if once they were in oyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neare to the city of THYATIRA, and lodged testemma himselfe as neare ynto him as he conveniently might. Now whilest he was compassing in his dement. lodging with a trench, Fimbriaes fouldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any camped at armour or weapon, to falute Sallaes fouldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their Thyapra. trench: which Fimbria feeing, and perceiuing his fouldiers mindes fo changed, of an extreame feare which he had of Sylla, at whose hands he looked for no mercie, killed himselfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole countrey of As 14 the leffe, to pay the summe of twenty thousand talents amongst them, and presently also he vindid many poore housholders bardly inthrough his infolent fouldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garrifon there. For he ordained, that every housholder should give the souldier that lodged in his house, foure Te- of Asia. tradrachmaes a day, and should be bound to give him and his friends (as many as he would bring with him)their supper also: and that every Captaine should have fiftie Drachmaes a day, a night gowne for the house, and a garment to go abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had given this order, he departed from the city of EPHBSVS with all his fleete, and in three daies fayling arrived in the hauen of Piræa at Athens, where he was received into the fraternity of the Mysteries, and reserved for himselfe the Librarie of Appellicon Teian: in the which were the most part of Ariffotle and Theophrastus workes, not then thought meete to come in eue- Aristoile rie mans hands. And they say, that this Librarie being brought to Rome, Tirannion the Grammarian found the meanes to extract a great part of them and that Andronicus the RHODIAN ha- bookers uing reconcred the originals into his hands, published them, and wrote the summaries which we have arthis present. For the ancient Peripateticke Philosophers were of themselues very wife and learned men, but they had not all Ariftotles works, nor Theophrastus amongst them, and yet those few they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together; because that the goods of Nelew Scepsian (to whom Theophraftus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and estimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at ATHENS, had fuch a paine and numneffe in his legges, and was fo heavie withall, that strabo calleth it a spice of the gout, that is to say, a feeling or entring therinto, which then began to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occasion he tooke the seas, and went vnto a place called ADIPSVM, where there are naturall hot baths; and there remained a while fola- at adaption cing himselfall the day long with musick, seeing of playes, and entertaining such kind of people. for the game in his legs. Vpon a day as he was walking by the fea fide, certain fifther me made him a prefent of fifth, which pleased him maruellous well: and demanding of them whence they were: they answered him againc, that they were of the city of ALES. What of ALES faid he is there any of them yet left aliue: speaking it, because that after the battell of ORCHOMENE, when he followed the chace of his enemies, he hadtaken and destroyed three cities of Bobotia all at one selfe time, to wir, ANTHE DON, LARYMNA, and ALES. The poore fisher men were so amazed with these words, that they stood still, and could not tell what to say . Sylla fell a laughing thereat, and bad them go their wayes a Gods name, and be not afraid, for they brought no small intercessiours with them, which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had given them these words, the ALEIANS which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had guien them these words, the ALBIANS went home with a mery heart, to gather themselves together againe in their city. preters whathe was, he made no answer that a man could vinderstand, but onely put foortha sharpe voice like the neying of a horse, or whinnying of a goate. Sylla wondering at it, abhorsed him, and made him to be carried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Syllahad imbarked his men to paffe the sea, he was afraid that so soone as they had landed in ITALY, they would shrinke from him, and enery man go home to his own city. But they sware and promised first of themselves, that they would tarie & keepe together, and by their wils would do no hurt in ITALY. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in need of mony, they offered him of theirs, and euery man to lend him as his ability serued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their good will: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valiant fouldiers, he went against fifteene Generals of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fiftie enfignes of footmen well armed, as he himselfewriteth in his commentaries. But the gods promised him good fortune in his wars, by many fundry apparent fignes. For in a facrifice he made by TARENTYM, after he was come on land, the liner of a certaine beaft facrififed, was altogether fashioned after the manner of a crowne or garland of lawrell, out of the which did hang two bands or rolles. And a litle before he went into Campania, neare vnto the mountaine Epheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuerthelesse was no matter of truth, but a vision only that appeared, and rising from the earth dispersed it felfe by little and little here and there in the aire, and in the end vanished quite away as clouds which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbamus the Confull, who brought two great armies against him, were ouerthrowne by him, before he had fet his men in battell, or had appointed any man in his place where he should fight: and this proceeded only vpon the courage and life of his foulders, whose good wilkto serue against them was such, as following this victory, he compelled the Consult Norbanus after he had flaine fixe thousand of his men, to take the city of CAPVA for his refuge. This noble exploit (as himfelfereported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he faith furthermore, that in the city of Sylvin, there was a flaue of one Pontius actizen, who being infpired with a propheticall ipirit, came to tel him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, and cary away the victory of these wars: howbeit that if he did not his him the sooner, the Capitoll at Rom flould be burnt. And so it fell out the same day according to his words, being the fixteenth day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllaes Captaines) being neare vnto the city of Fidentia with fixteene enfignes onely, against fiftie enfignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be very well affected to serue, because the most part of them were naked and vnarmed, was afraid to hazard the battell: and as he was euen bethinking himselfe what was best to determine thereof, there rose a litle wind out of a goodly meadow, that blew a wonderfull fort of flowers vpon the fouldiers on every part of them. These flowers staied of themselves as they fell, some vpontheir of a medion targets, and others vpon their morians, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their In fauldiers enemies a far off, as if they had bene garlands of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus fouldiers more lufty a great dealethen they were before, & with this good will they determined to giue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they ouerthrew, flue eighteene thousand of them in the field, & took their camp. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates & Tigranes. Neuertheleffe, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vse policie with force: and therefore practifed with scipio one of the Confuls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it and thereupon were oft meetings and affemblies of both fides. Now Sylla draue off the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasio of delay, to the end that his soldiers which werethroughly acquainted with craft & fubtilty as well as himselfe, might in the means time corrupt Scipioes fouldiers by repaire into his campe for they coming into Scipioes campe, being very conuerfant with them, ftraight corrupted fome of them with readic mony, other with promises, and other with faire flattering words, and many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practife had continued a while, Sylla coming neare vnto Scipioes campe with 20 ensignes onely: all his men saluted Scipioes soldiers, & they resaluting them again, yeelded them. felues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was lest postalone in his tet, where he was take, but they afterwards by peine. let him go. So Sylla with his 20 enfignes, like to the fowlers, that by their stales draw other birds into their nets, hauing gotten forty enfignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo faid of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe. and a lion both: but that the foxe did him more hurt and mischiefe then the lion. After this, Ma. Soldaton. riss the younger having fourescore and flue ensignes in his campe neare vnto the city of Sto- shing the NIVM, presented battell vnto Sylla: who having very good desire to fight, and specially on that fore to life, Maries the day because the night before he had seene this vision in his dreame, that he thought he saw Mariss the father (who was deceaffed long before) warning his fonne that he should come to him. with 85-Sylla forthis respect desired maruellously to fight that day : and thereupon caused Dolabella to presenteth come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies stept betweene him syllaband and home, and stopped his passage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllaes souldiers to the by the city contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with fo great labour and paine, that they were sillars vial weary and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruellous great shower of raine vpon fin this them as they were buffe opening the way, that troubled them more then the labour they had in hand. Wherupon the privat captaines of the bands went to make Sylla vnderstand it, and to pray him to deferre the battel vntil another day: shewing him how the fouldiers wearied with labor. lay down vpontheir targets on the ground to take their ease. Sylla perceiuing this, was cotented withall, though greatly indeed against his will. But when he had given the fignall to lodge, and that they began to trench and fortifie their campe, Marius the younger cometh on horsebacke marching brauely before all his company, hoping to have furprised his enemies in disorder, and by that meanes to have overthrowne them eafily. But far otherwife did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his forefaid dreame; for his men falling in a rage withall, left their worke in the trench where they wrought, stucke their darts you the banke, ran your their enemies with their fwords drawne, and with a maruellous crie fet vpon them fo valiantly, that they were notable to refift their furie, but fodainly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable flaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the city of PR ENE- Marius fled STE, where he found the gates shut: but they threw him downed rope from the wall, which he tyedabout his middle, and so was triced up by it. Yet some writers say, and Fenestella among other; that Marius neuer faw the battell: for being wearied with labour, and very fleepie, he lay vnder some tree in the shadow to rest a little, after he had given the signall and word of the battell, and flept fo foundly, that he could scant awake with the noise and flying of his men. Sylla himselfewriteth, that he lost at this battell but three and twenty men, slue twentie thoufand of his enemies, and tooke eight thousand prisoners. His Lieutenants also had the like good fuccesse in other places, Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and Seruilius . which without any losse of their men, or but with a very small, ouerthrew many great mighty armies of their enemies. Infomuch as Carbo, the head and chiefe of all the contrary faction, and he that most maintained it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyond the feas into Africks. The last battell that Sylla had, was against Thelesinus Samnite, who comming like a fresh champion to set vpon him, when he was already wearied, and had fought many battels, had almost staine him even the Samat Rome gates. For Thelesinus having gathered together a great number of fouldiers, with metaput One Lamponius Lycanian, marched with all speede towards the city of PR ENESTE, to deliver great date. Marius the younger that was besieged there. But vnderstanding that Sylla on the one side ger. came in great haste also to meete him, and that Pomponius came behind him on the other side, and perceiuing moreouer that the way was so shut vp, that he could goe neither forward nor backward, being a valiant fouldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fields, most dangerously ventured to go straight to Rome. And so stole away by night with all his whole Power, and marching to Rom B ward, had almost taken it at his first comming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept:but he stayed happily tenne furlongs from the gate Collina, bragging with himfelfe, and beleeuing that he should do wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Captaines. The next morning betimes came divers young Noblemen and Gentlemen Out of the city to skirmish with Thelesinus: who slue agreat number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young Gentleman of a noble house, and very honest. Whereupon (as you may easily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and specially the women, who fell a shreeking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had sent) came first with seuen hundred horse vponthe spurre, and staying but a little to coole and give them breath, bridled straight again, & went to set upon the enemies, thereby to stay them. Soone after him came Salla also, who commanded his men that came first, quickly to cate somewhat, and that done, purthem straight in battell ray: notwithstanding that Dolabella and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrarie, and befought him not to put his fouldiers wearied with their journey, to fo great and manifest a danger; and the rather, because they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNITES and LYCANS: who were both warlike nations and good fouldiers, & those besides that most deadly hated the ROMAINES. But for all that, Sylla sent them backe, and commanded his trumpets to sound the alarme, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Crassus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very fore distressed, and stood in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white courfer that was both fwift & very strong. The enemies knew him, & there were two that lifted up their armes to throw their darts at him, whom he faw not: but his page gaue his horse such a lash with his whippe, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very points of the darts came hard by the horse tayle & stucke fast in the ground. Some fay, that Sylla had a little golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of DELPHES, and intime of warres wore it alwaies in his bosome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kiffing it, faid : O Apollo Pythias, haft thou fo highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, fo fortunate hitherto through fo many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame ouerwhelme him wholly, even at the very gates of his own naturall city among his countreymen. And fo crying out to Apollo for helpe, thrust into the preaseamong his men, intreating some, threatning others, and laying upon the rest to stay them. But for all he could do, all the left wing of his armie was broken and overthrowne by his enemies: and himselfe amongst them that sled, was compelled to recouer his can p with speed, having lost many of his friends and familiars. There were moreouer many citizens flaine and troden under feete (both with horse and men) that came onely to fee the battell fought: fo that they within the city thought themselues verily vndone. Lucretius Offella furthermore (he that besieged Marin in the city of PRENESTE) had almost raised his fieged Marimin Pra- ficge, upon the words of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to remoue with all speed possible, for Sylla was slaine, and Thelesinus had taken Rome. Now about midnight came certaine fouldiers from Crassus to Syllaes campe, and asked for meate for Crassus life nure fupper, and his mens, who having chased his flying enemies whom he had overthrowne vnto the city of Antenna (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Syllavnder-5) Habefie- standing that, and being advertised that the most part of his enemies were overthrowne at this battell, went himselfe the next morning betimes vnto Antenna, where three thousand of his enemies sent to know if he would receive them to mercy if they yeelded themselves vnto him, His answer was, that he would pardon their lives, so as they would do some mischiefto their fellowes before they came to him. These three thousand her cupon trusting to his promise, fell vp-Pranefte. 3000 (aut on their companions: and for the most part one of them killed another. Notwithstanding Sylshemfelues la having gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as the rest, amounting in all to the number of six thousand, within the shew-place wherethey vied yeelded to to runtheir horses, whilest he himselfe held a councell in the temple of the goddesse Bellona, and Salla rpon was making his oration there; he had appointed certaine to set vpon those 6000, and put them to promiseof the fword every man. Great & terrible were the cries of fuch a number of men flaine in fo small a roome as may eafily be coniectured: infomuch as the Senators fitting in councell heard them very cafily, and maruelled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begun with a fet steadie countenance, without changing of colour, willed them only to hearken what he faid, and not to trouble themselues with any thing done abroad, for they were but certaine offenders and leud perfons that were punished by his commandement. This was enough to shew the simplest Romaine in Rome, that they had but onely changed the tyrant, and not the tyrannic. Now for Marius, that had ever bene of a churlish and severe nature, even from his childhood, he neuer changed for any authority, but did rather harden his naturall stubburnnes.

Where Sylla contrarily in the beginning, was very modest and civill in al his prosperity, & gaue great good hope, that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauour nobility well, and yet loue notwithstanding the benefit of the people. And being moreouer a man in his youth gi-uen to all pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, & weepe for tender harriin that he became

But whether that alteration of nature came by changing sollathe his state and condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to flew it felfe, when the way of liberty was layed open: this matter is to be decided in some other Treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fell to shedding of bloud, and filled all morthers ROME with infinite and vnfpcakcable murthers: for divers were killed for private quarels, that committed had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffered his friends and those about him to worke in Rome by their wicked wills: vntill at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was fo bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should reve bold to aske sylla in open senate, when an these mileties mound end, and when they motion when all the miseries were finished the which they dayly faw. For, said he, we will not inseffect care. treate you to pardon life, where you have determined death; but only to put them out of doubt is Meselwhom you have determined to faue. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resoluted linguistill whom he would faue. Metellus replyed, Thentell vs (quoth he) who they are that shall die. Sylla size in the condition of the sylla size of the condition who have a sylla size of the condition o answered, he would. Howbeit some say, it was not Metellus, but Austidius one of his flatterers, open Senate that spake this last word vnto him. Wherfore Sylla immediatly, without making any of the magistrates priuie, caused fourescore mens names to be set vp vpon posts, whom he would put to death. Euery man being offended withall, the next day following he fet vp 220 mens names more: and likewise the third day as many more. Hercupon, making an oration to the people, he told them openly, that he had appointed all them to die, that he could cal to remembrance; howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should die, by daies, as he did call them to mind. Whosoeuer faued an outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindnesse, he himselfe was condemned to die: not excepting them that had received their brothers, their fonnes, their fathers, nor mothers. And the reward of euery homicide & murtherer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talents: though it were a flaue that had killed his mafter, or the fonne that had flaine the father. But the most wicked and vniust act of all was, that he deprined the sonnes, and sonnes sons ofthem whom he had killed, of all credit and good name; and befides that, had taken all their goods as confiscate. And this was not onely done in Rome, but also in all the cities of ITALIE throughout: and there was no temple of any god what foeuer, no altar in any bodies house, no libertie of hospitall, nor fathers house, that was not embrued with bloud and horrible murther. For the husbands were flaine in their wives armes, and the children on their mothers laps; and yet they which were flaine for private hatred and malice, were nothing in respect of those that there of our were murthered onely for their goods. And they that killed them, might well fay, His good- lawes genely greathouse made that man die, his goodly faire garden the other, and his hore bathes another. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thing, and least Quintus looked that thefe euils should light vpon him, and that onely pitied those which he saw so mise- develue a rably murthered, went one day into the market place, and reading the bill fet vp of the outlawes that mednames, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cryed out aloud: Alasthe day that euer I led not, was borne, my house of Alba maketh me be put to death. He went not far from the market his bone. place, but met with one that killed him prefently. In the meanetime Marius the yonger feeing he Marius che could by no meanes escape if he were taken, slue himself. And Sylla coming to PR ENESTE, did himselfe as first execute them by one & by one, keeping a certaine forme of instice in putting them to death: but afterwards, as if he had no longer ley sure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a salla sue place together, to the number of twelue thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword men in euery man, saving his host onely; vnto whom he said, that he shewed him speciall fauour to save prenesses his life. But his hoft answered him stoutly againe, that he would not be beholding vnto him for being all his life, feeing he had flaine all the rest of his countreymen: and so thrusting in amongst the citizens, was willingly flaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very strange, together. who had flaine his owne brother before the civill war was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put tiline flae him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his defire. his owne Catiline thereupon to shew his thankfulnesse for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went present- brother. ly and flue Marcus Marius, who was of the contrary faction, and brought him his head for a prefent before all the people, in the midst of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his hands all bloudied in the hallowed font of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murthers committed, yet were there other things also that

grieued the people maruelloufly. For he proclaimed himself Dictator, which office had not him of fixfcore yeares before in vie, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, gining him free libertie afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confifcate their goods: to destroy cities, and to build up new as he lifted: to take away kingdomes, and to give them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly fold the goods confiscate, by the cryer, sitting fo proudly & stately in his chaire of state, that it grieued the people more to see those goods packs vp by them to whom he gaue and disposed them, then to see them taken from thosethat had forfeited them. For fometimes he would give a whole country, or the whole revenues of cer. taine cities, vnto women for their beauty, or vnto pleasant iesters, minstrels, or wicked slaves made free; and vnto some he would give other mens wives by force, and make them to be married against their wils. For he desiring (how seeuer it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the Great, commanded him to put away his wife he had maried: and taking Amylia (the daughter of Amilius Seaurus, and of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to mary her great with child as she was by Glabrio: but she died in childbed in Pompeys house. Lucretius Offellaslio that had brought Marins the younger to that distresse at the city of PRENESTE, suing to be Confull, sylla commanded him to ceasife his suite: but he notwithstanding that expresse commandement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauoured his cause: whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that slue Offella before al the people; himself sitting in a chaire of estate in the temple of Castor & Pollux, & seeing fro about the muri ther done. The people that were about offella, laid hold of the murtherer straight, and brought him before Sylla: but Sylla bad them be quiet that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him go, because he commanded them to do it. Furthermore, as touching his tri. umph, it was a sumptuous fight to behold, for the rarenesse of the riches, and princely spoyles which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the fight, to fee the banished Romaines, who were the chiefest nobleme of al the city of Rome, following his chariot triumphant wearing garlands of flowers on their heads, calling Sylla their father and fauiour: because that by his meanes they returned to their country, and recouered their goods, wives & children. In the end of histriumph, he made an oration, in open affembly of the people of Rome, in the which he did not only declare vnto the (according to the custome) what things he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and successes as of his valiant deeds besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauour fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by them, Felix, to say, happie or fortunate. And he himselfe when he wrote vnto the GRECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them, furnamed himselfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasant man, beloued and sauoured of Venus. His tokens of triumph which are yet in our countrey, have this superscription: Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, 2 fon and a daughter: he named his fon Faustus, fignifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausta: because the Romaines call Faustum that which falleth outprosperously & happily. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doings, that not with standing he had killed & put fo many mento death, and had made fo great a change and innovation in the commonwealth, yet of himself he lest off his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Confuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a private man among the citizens, offering himfelfe to every man that would aske him account of his doings past. It happened that a stout and rash enemy of his was chosen Confull against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for any denotion the people had to Lepidus, but onely to gratifie Pompey, who gaue countenance & fauour vnto him. Sylla feeing Pompey come merry homewards from the election, & ioyfull that he had obtained his friends fute from all other futers: took him aside, and told him: Indeed thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my friend, for thouhast done a goodly act, to choose Marcus Lepidus Consull, the veriest asse in all Rome, before Catulus the honestest man. But I tell thee onething, thou hadst not neede to sleepe: for thou hast strengthened an enemie, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proved a true prophet: Speared feet the people of the Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediatly after, flatly fell at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla confecrating the diffmes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding fumptuous feaftes Sylla confectating the claimes of all his goods vnto Hercules, made exceeding sumptions feastes typearts old vnto the Romaines, the provision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that every day they e powerd, threw a great deale of meate into the river, and they dranke wine of forty yeares old and above.

During these feasts which continued many daies, his wife Metella sickened, and died, and in her ficknesse the Priests and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neare her, nor suffer his houseto be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was dinorced from her in her fickneffe, and caused her to be carried into another house, whilest she lined. And thus did Sylla curiously observe the superstition and ordinance of the Soothsayers: but vet he brake the law which he made himfelfe, touching the order of funerals, sparing no bisowns coffat Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake another order himselfe had made, touching lames he the reformation of bankets: comforting his forrow with ordinarie feafts, full of all vanitie and lasciuious field. Within a few moneths after, he had fencers games at the sharpe; and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnseuered, men and women sitting together, it fortuned that there was a faire Ladie, and of a noble house, that sate hard by Sylla, called Valeria: the was the daughter of Messala, and fifter of Hortensius the Orator, that had bene divorced not long before from her husband. This Ladie passing by Sylla behind him, did foftly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a haire from off his gowne, and so went on to her place, and fate her downe. Sylla maruelling at this familiarity, looking earnestly upon her: It is nothing my Lord (quoth she) but that I defire with others to be partaker a little of your happinesse. Her Valeriada words misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that she had tickled him with them; for he from to be fent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had lived. of Syllats But after many flie lookes betweene them, they turned their faces one to another vponeuery. happingfe. occasion, with prettie smiling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise and sold maricontract mariagetogether, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as the fifter of wife, as honest, and as vertuous a Ladie as could be possible, yet the occasion that made sylla Hortersius marrie her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a yong boy: which commonly flew forth the filthieft passions of the minde, to be so carried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this faire young Ladie in his house, he left not the company of women minstrels and tumblers. and to have pleasant iesters and musitions about him, with whom he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, upon little couches made for the nonce. For, his companions that were ingreatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscius a maker of common playes, Sorax a prince of scoffers, and one Metrobius a finging man, whom he was in lone withall while he lived, and yet did not diffemble his love, though he was past age to be beloved. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his dilease, the originall cause whereof had light foundation at the first. For he lived a great time before he perceived that he had an impostume in his body, the which by processe of time came to corrupt his stesh in such fort, that it turned allto lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him conti- possume nually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that mul-turned to tiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it felfe, but was prefently filled with fwarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the batheto wash and cleanse himselfe of them, but all would not serue: for the changing of his flesh into this putriture wan it straight againe, that there was no cleansing, nor shifting of him, that could keepe such a number of lice from him. Some say, that in old time (amongst the most ancient men, whereof there is any memorie) Acastus the sonne of Pe. Diversifalius, died of the lowfic euill: and long time afteralfo, the Poet Aleman, and Pherecides the mous men that died of divine: and so did Callishenes OLYNTHIAN in prison, and Mutius a wise lawyer. And if we lies shall make mention of those that are famous, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bondman called Eunus, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in Sicilia, being taken and carried to Rome, died also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not onely foresee his death, but he wrote something of it also: for he made an end of writing thetwo and twentieth booke of his commentaries, two daies before he died. Inthat booke containe 22 he laith, that the wife men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had lived hoSplace for nonrably, he should end his daies in the slower of all his prosperity. And there he saith also, that was that his sonne (who departed a little before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe, dead appearapparelled in an ill fauoured gowne, and that comming vnto him, he prayed him he would inhidrent go with him vnto Metella his mother, thencefoorth to live in peace and rest with her. But for soil fanouall his disease, he would not give over to deale in matters of state. For tendaies before his red apparell LANYM (in Italian called Pozzolo) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinances, whereby they should gouerne themselues. And the day before he died, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the commonwealth, deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he sent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there caused his men to compasse himabout, and commanded them to strangle him in his fight. The passion of his anger was so vehement against him, that by the extreme straining of himselfe, he brake the impostume in his bodie, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of blood: by reason whereof his strength sailing him, he was full of paine and pangs that night, and so died, leaving the two little children he hadby Metella, For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, because the Romaines call those children that are borne after the deathof their fathers, Posthami. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consull Lepidus, to let that his body should not be honourably buried, as they were accustomed to burie noblemen and men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had given him nothing in his will, and had remembred all his other friends: yet he made some for lone, fome by intreatic, and others with threatning to let it alone, and accompanying the corpesinto Rome, gaue both fafetic and honour vnto the performance of his funerals. And it is faydalfo, that the ROMAINE Ladies, amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of persume and odoriferous matter towards the fame: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and ten great baskets, they made a greatimage to the likenesse of sylla himselfe, and another of a sergeant carrying the axes beforehim, all of excellent incense and cinamon. When the day of the funerals came, fearing left it would raine in the forenoone, all the element being fo cloudie, they deferred to carrie forth the body to be burnt, vntill past three of the clocke in the afternoone. And then rose there such a sudden boisterous wind, that it set all the stake of wood straight on fire, that the body was burnt at a trice; and the fire going out, sell a great shower of raine that held on till night: fo that it seemed, geed fortune following him even to his end, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the field of Mars: and they fay that he himfelfe made his owne Epitaph that is written upon it, which was: That no mandid euer passe him, neither in doing good to his friends, nor in doing mischiefe to his enemics.

Sylla with Lysander.

OW that we have at large also set forth the life of the ROMAINE. let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both alike. that both of them grew to be great men, rifing of themselves through their owne vertue: but this onely is proper to Lylander, that all the offices and dignities which he attained vinto in the common-wealth, were layd vpon him through the peoples goodwils and confents: for he compelled them to nothing, neither viurped he any extraordinarie authority vpon them, contrarie to law; for as the common faying is:

Where partialitie, and discord once do raigne: There wicked men are most esteem'd, and rule with greatest gaines

As at that time in Rome, the people being corrupted, and the state of government viterly subuerted and brought to nought: to day there role vp one tyrant, to morrow another. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla viurped and ruledall, when fuch fellowes as Glaucias & Satur. mius, did both banish and drive out of Rome such men as Metellus was: and where also in open affembly they flue the Confuls fons in the market place, and where force of armes was bought and fold for gold and filuer, with the which the fouldiers were corrupted; and where they made new lawes with fire and fword, and forced men to obey the fame. Yet I speake not this in reproach of him that in fuch trouble some times found meanes to make himselfe the greatest man: butto shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity hegrew vnto in so vnfortunate a city, The chiefe although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from Spark (at what time it person is flourished most, and was the best gouerned commonweale) he in all great causes, and in the bounds. most honourable offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chiefes; eff. whereof it came to passe, that the one did often resigne up his authoritie to his citizens, which they had given him, who also restored it to him againe many and sundrie times; for the honour of his vertue did alwaics remaine, and made him infily accounted for the worthicftman: where the other being onely once chosen Generall of anarmie, remained ten yeares continually in warres and hostility, making himselfe by force, sometime Confull, sometime vice Confull, and sometime Dictator, but alwaies continued a tyrant. Indeed Lysander attempted to change and alter the state of government in his countrey, howbeit it was with great lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he fought it by reason, and good perswafion, not by the fword neither would hemake a change of the wholeat one felf time as Sylladid, but fought only to reforme the election of kings. The which thing according to nature, doubtleffe feemed very just : that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen king of that city, which was the chiefe ouer all GRECE, not for her nobility, but for her vertue onely.

For like as a good hunter doth not feek for the whelp of a good dog, but for the good dog him felfe: nor a wise man of armes also, the cost that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse himselfe, Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a civill government, committeth a foule fault, if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince himselfeshould be confidering that the LACED EMONIANS themselues have deprined diverse of their kines from their crowne and realme, because they were not princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is alwaies ill of it selfe: but vertue is honoured for her selfe alone, and not because she is placed with nobility. Now for the wrongs and iniuries they both committed, the one did worke onely to pleasure his friends, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine that Ly fander did great wrongs to gratifie his familiars: and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannicall power of certaine his friends. Where Sylla fought for spite to take away his army from Pompey and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which himselfe had given him, and caused Lucretius Offellato be flaine openly in his owne fight, because he sought to be Consul, for recompence of the good feruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, caufing his owne friends to be flaine in fuch fort. he made enery man afeard of him. Furthermore, their behaviours touching couctoufnesse and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other that of atvrant. For we do not find that Lyfander, for all his great princely authority, did ever vseanv emperance infolency or lasciuious nesse in his deeds, but alwaies avoided as much as a man might, the revatelife. proachof this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: he led fuch a true LA cons-AN life, straightly reformed in all points. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull lusts, neither for pourty when he was young, nor for age, when it came upon him. But whileft he gaue lawes to the ROMAINES touching matrimonial honestie and chastitie, himselfe in the meanetime did nothing but follow loue, and commit adulteries, as Salust writeth. By meanes whereof he so much impouerished Rome, and left it so voide of gold and silver, that for readie mony he fold absolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his daily studieto confiscate & take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthy houses in al the whole city of Rome. But all this spoyle & hauock was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away upon his iesters and flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we think he kept in his gifts and private bankets, when openly in the day time (all the people of Rome being present, to see him sell the goods which he had caused to be confiscate) he made one of his friends and familiars, to trusse vpa great deale of houshold stuffe, for a very little price: and when any other had out-bidden his price, and that the cryer had cried it out aloud: then was he angry, and faid: My friends, I have great wrong done me here, not to fuffer me fell the spoile I have gotten, at mine owne pleasure, & dispose it as I list my self. Where Lysander contrarily sent to the commonwealth of Sparta, with other money, the very prefents that were given to himselfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deed. For peraduenture he did more hurt to Sparta, bringing thither that gold and filuer, then Sylla did to Rome, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alledge this onely for proofe and declaration, that Lysander was nothing couetous. They both have done that vnto their city, which never any other but themselves did. For Sylla being ariotous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithstanding to good order and government; and Lyfander contrarily filled his city with vice, yet not intected withall himselfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the law he commanded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was himselfe: for he taught the Spartans to desire thosethings, which he aboue all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and civil gouernement. Now for matters of warreand battels fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lysander wan onely but two battels by sea, besides the taking of the city of ATHENS: which (though I grant him being rightly confidered, was no great exploit of war, howbeit it was a noble act, confidered ring the fame he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in Bo E OT IA, hard by the city of ALFARTE: aman might fay peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet methinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he staied not for king Paufanias aide (the which came from Plas TÆES immediatly after his ouerthrow) and because he went in a gaire, in fury, and in a vaine ambition to run his head against a wall: so that men of al forts making a desperate fally out of ALI. ARTE vpon him flue him there to no purpose, Farre valike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of Levetre s, refifting his enemies that diffressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keep his men from flying, and to give them affured victory, received his deadly wound: for all these mendied like noble kings, and valiant captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast himself away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the ancient Spar-TANS did like wife men, to avoide the fight with wals. For the noblest and valiantest man that is. or noffible can be, may eafily be fo flaine, not onely by the first fouldier that commeth, but by curry filly woman or child. As they fay, that the worthic Achilles was killed by Paris within the . very gates of Troia. Now to the contrary againe, the victories that sylla wan in fet battels, and thethousands of enemies which he flue, are not easily to be numbered, besides also that he took the city of Rome twice: and the hauen of ATHENS, not by famine as Lylander did, but by force, affer he had by many great battels driven Archelaus out of firme land into the maine sea. It is to be confidered allo, against what captaines they made warres. For me thinks it was but a passime as a man might fay, for Lyfander to fight with Antiochus, a pilot of Alcibiades, or to surptife and deceiue Philocles, a common Oratorat ATHENS:

LYSANDER AND SYLLA.

Whose busie tongue, much worse then two edg'd sword did seeme: Which pratled ftill and honesty did neuer once esteeme.

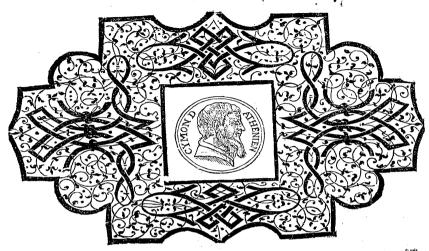

And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchfafe to compare with his horse-keeper, nor Marius with one of his fergeants or mace-bearers. But to leave afide y particular names of all other Princes, Lords, Confuls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernours that made wars with Sylla: what Romaine Captaine was there more to be feared; then Marius? what king living wishmen wasthere of fuch power as king Mithridates? And of Generals and Lieutenants of armies in all of greatest ITALY, were there any euer more valiant, then Lamponius & Thelesinus: of the which Sylla draue power and the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and flue the two last? But the greatest matter them. of althat we have spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lylander did all his noble acts, with the aide of his whole countrey, where Syllato the contrary did his (being banished from his countrey) by his enemics. And at the selfe same time that they draue Syllaes wife out of Rome, that they ouerthrew his houses, and flue his friends also in Rome: he not with standing made warres in the meane time with infinite thousands of fighting men in Borotta, and ventured his perfon in manifold dangers, fo that in the end he conquered them all, to the honour and benefit of his country. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer floupeto king Mithridates, for any particular alliance he offered him, neither yeeld vnto him for any aide of men, or mony, to war against his enemies: but (athing most chiefly to be noted about the rest) he would not youch safe to speake to Mithridates, norto take him by the hand only, before he had spoken it with his own mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would forgo Asia, deliuer him his galleys, and give vp the realmes of BITHYNIA & CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kings. This methinks was the goodlieft act square that ener Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimitie, to have preferred the benefit of magnanimities. the comonwealth in that fort, before his private commodity. For therin he was like vnto a good greyhound, that first pincheth the Deare, and holdeth him fast till he have overthrowne him: and then afterwards followeth the pursuite of his own private quarrell. And lastly, methinks it is easily judged, what difference there was betweene their two natures, in that they did both towards the city of ATHENS. For Sylla having taken it, after the citizes had made fierce wars with him for the increase of king Mithridates greatnesse: yet he left it free vnto them, enjoying their ownelawes. Where Lyfander to the contrary, feeing fuch a mighty state and Empire as that ouerthrowne from the great rule it bare, had no pitie of it at all, but tooke away the liberty of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before, and established there ve- Plutarelis ry cruell and wicked tyrants. And therfore in mine opinion, we shall not much swarue from the of 83/14 60 troth, if we give this judgement: that Sylla did the greater acts, and Lylander committed the Lylanders. fewer faults. And that we give to the one the honour of a continent and modest man; and to the other, the commendation of a valiant and skilfull fouldier.

Reripoltas the Soothfayer, he that brought King Opheltas out of These SALY into the country of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time sourished in that country, the more part of the which were euer refident in the city of CHERONEA, because it was the first city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expulsed thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great courage, and naturally giuen to the warres: who were fo forward and aduenturous in all dangers thereof (in the inuafions of the MEDES into GRECE, and in the battels of the GAVLES) that they were flaine all of them, but onely Damon (a little childe left fatherlesse and motherlesse) surnamed Peripoltas that escaped; who for goodly personage and no-ble courage excelled all the susty youths of his time, though otherwise he were very rude, & of a seuere nature. Now it fortuned, that when Damon was growne of fullage, a Romaine Captaine of an enfigne of footemen (lying in garrison for the winter season in the citie of CHA-RONEA) fell in great loue with Damon: and because he could not reape the fruites of his dishonest loue by no intreaty nor gifts, there appeared vehement presumptions, that by force he wet about to abuse him, for that CHERONEA at that time (being my naturall citie where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon mistrusting the Captaines villany, and detesting his abominable defire, watched him a shrewdrume, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compasse his enterprise) to be of counsell with him, and take his part against the Captaine. Now there were fixteene of them in confort together, that one night blacked their faces al with foote, and the next morning after they had drunke together, by the breake of day fet vpon this Romaine Captaine, that was making facrifice in the market place, and flue him with a good number of the market place. ber of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the city, which was straight in a great vprore for the murther committed. Thereupon they called a councell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death; hoping thereby to hauecleared their innocency for the fact done vnto the Romaines. But the felf same night, as al the magistrates and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne-house, according to their non it. It chanced about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being fent on some journy, passed by the city of CHERONEA with his army, & because this murther was but newly done, he stayed there a few daies to examine the troth and originall thereof: and found that the commons of the city Lucius Luwere in no fault, but that they themselves also had received hurt: whereupon he tooke the souldiers of the Romaines that remained of the garrifon, and carried them away with him. In the truth of meane time, Damon destroyed all the country thereabout, and still houered neare to the city infomuch as the inhabitants of the same were driven in the end to send vnto him, and by gentle words & fauourable decrees handled him fo, that they inticed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongst them, they chose him Gymnasiarchus, to say, a master of exercifes of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oile in his stoue or hot-house, flarke naked as he was they flue him by treason. And because that there appeared spirits of long time after in that place, and that there were heard gronings and fighings as our fathers told vs. flaint by they caused the doore of the hot-house tobe walled vp-yet toral that, there are visions seene, & treasen, terrible voices & cries heard in that felfe place vnto this present time, as the neighbors dwelling by do testifie. Now they that were descended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the country of Phocides, neare vnto the city of Stiris, who do only of all other both keepe the language & maners of the ATOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENI, fignifying black, and beimeared with foote; because that Damon and his fellowes did black their faces with foote, when they were and flue the ROMAINE CADTAINE. But the ORCHOMENIAN'S being neare neighbours vnto the CHE- why local-RONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hired an informer of Rome, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole city (as if it had bin one private person alone) for the murther of the Romaines, whom Damon and his companions had flaine. The inditement was drawne, and the case pleaded charonea before the governor of Macedon, for that the Romain Bs did fend no governors at that time the mustler into GRECE: & the counsellors that pleaded for the city of CHERONEA, relied vpon the testimony of Lucius Lucullus, referring themselves to his report, who knew the troth & how it was, Lucullus Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of answer advertised the ve- called for ry troth: fo was our city cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stood in danger of vtter de

The inhabitants of the city of CHERONEA, for that they had escaped the danger by testimony of Lucius Lucullus, to honour him withall, they fet vp his image in stone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be living at this present, though many yeares begone & paffed fince, do not with standing reckon our selves partakers of his forepassed tillor, is benefit. And because we are perswaded, that the image & portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens maners and conditions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that represented any men manmans person or shape only; we will comprehend his life & doings according to the troth, in this mersand volume of noble mens lives, where we do compare and fort them one with another. It shall be wifedome. fufficient for vs therefore, that we shew our selves thankfull for his benefit; and we think, that he himself would mislike, for reward of his true testimony, to be required with a fauorable lie rold in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a paffing faire face drawne, and lively counterfeited. A pretrie and that hath an excellent good grace with all, yet fome manner of blemish or imperfection in it, we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curioufly to shew it, because the one would deforme the counterfeit, and the other make it very vnlikely. Euenfo, because it is a hard thing (or to fay better, peraduenture vnpossible) to describe a man, whose life should Home to dealtogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first studie to write his vertues at large, and thereby seeke perfectly to represent the troth, even as the life it selfe. But where by chance we find certaine faults and errours in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by necesfitie of the time or state of the commonwealth; they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednesse proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not neede too curiously to expresse in our historie, but rather to paffe them lightly ouer, of reuerent shame to the meere frailty of mans nature, which cannot bring forth aman of such vertue and perfection, but there is ever some imperfection in him. And therefore, confidering with my felfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it comme, & best to compare him with Cimon, because they have bene both valiant souldiers against their Lucultus in enemies, having both done notable exploits in warres against the barbarous people: and what things they were the onely men that pacified the civill wars and diffention in their country, and both the one and the other of the wan notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer Grecian captaine before Cimon, nor ROMAINE captaine before Lucullus, that had made wars fo farreoff from their country, leaving apart the deeds of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the acts also of Perseus against the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS: and the deeds of Iasonalso, if there remaine any monument extant fince that time, worthy of credit in these our daies. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together, that they neuer ended their warres: they onely ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Againe, we may note in them a great resemblance of nature, for their honesty, curtesie and humanity, which they shewed vnto strangers in their country: and for the magnificence and sumptuousnesse of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we do leaue out some other similarides between them: howbeit in the discourse of their lives they will easily appeare. Cimon was the sonne of Miltiades and of Hegefipyle, a Thracian woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde written in certaine poeticall verses which Melanthius and Archelaus have written of Cimon. The father of Thueydides the hittoriographer himfelf, who was of kinal fo vnto Cimen, was called in like maner Olorus, shewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his ancestours, and did also possesses of gold in the countrey of THRACIA. It is said moreouer, that he died in a certaine place called the ditchy forrest, where he was slaine; how beit that his asses and bones were caried into the countrey of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yetto this day, amongst the tombes of them of the house and family of Cimon, neare vnto the tombe of Cimons owne fifter called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the village of Altmys, and Milia. des of the village of LACIA. This Militades, Cimons father, being condemned by the state to Miltiades pay the summe of fiftietalents, was for non payment cast into prison, and there died: and lest Cimon and his fifter Elpinice aliue, both orphanes, and very yong. Now, Cimon in his first young yeares had a very ill name and report in the city, being counted a riotous young man, and a great Cimon dedrinker, following his grandfather Cimons fashions vp and downe, as he had also his name saning that his grandfather for his beastlinesse was surnamed Coalemos, as much to say, as foole. Stefimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimons time, writeth, that Cimon neuer learned musicke, nor a-Coalemos, ny other of the liberall sciences, accustomably taught to yong noble mens sons of GRECE, and that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper vnto children borne in the country of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without diffimulation, fo that he rather lived Peloponnesian like, then like an Athenian. For he was even fuch as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be: A simple man he was, and could not well disguise:

As honesteke in things of weight, as wit could well denise. This served fitly to be applied vnto Stesimbrotus words written of him : but not withstanding, in his first young yeareshe was suspected of incontinencie with his sister, who indeed otherwise had no very good name. For the was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners upon the wals of the gallery called the Plesianaction, and now Paciti: (to fay, fet out and beautified with divers pictures) he drew (as they fay) Laodices face vpon Elpinices picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for monies fake, but gaue his labour franckly to the commonwealth, as all the historiographers that wrote in that time do witnesse: and as the Poet Melanthins also reciteth in these

At his owne proper charge, greate cost he hath bestowed, In decking up our temples here with gilded roofes embowed, For honour of the gods. And in our tongue likewife, He hath adorn'd the common place, with many a fine deuise : Painting and fetting forth in stately shew to fee, The images of demy-gods that here amongst vs be.

Elpinice be- Yet some say that Elpinice did not secretly company with her brother Cimen, but lay with him ing poore, openly as his lawfull maried wife, because she could not for her pouertie haue a husband of like nobility and parentage to her felfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richest men in the city, did afterwards fall in fancie with her, and desired to marrie her, offering sober thate and calling, to pay her father Militades fine of fiftie talents, wherein he flood condemned a debter to the flate, to that he might have her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vpon that condition maried his fifter Elpinice vito Callias. This notwithstanding, it is certaine that Cimon was somewhat amorous and given to love women. For Melanthius the Poet in certaine of his Elegies, cimon ful. maketh mention for his pleasure of one Afteria borneat SALAMINA, and of another called Afne-uses the fra, as if Cimon had bene in love with them. But vindoubtedly, he loved his lawfull wife Isalice maruellous well, the daughter of Euryptolemus, Megacles fonne, and tooke her death very grienoufly, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were written vnto him, to comfort him in his forrow, Panatins the Philosopher is of opinion, that Archelaus the Philition wrote those clegies: and fure it is not valikely, confidering the time in which they were written. But furthermore, Cimons nature and conditions descrued great commendation. For his valiantnesse he gaue not The praise place vnto Militades, and for his wifedome and indgement, he was not inferiour vnto Themisto. of Cinous cles and it is out of all doubt that he was a juster and honester man, then either of them both. For he was equall with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valiantnesse of a noble captaine: and he did much excell them both in properties of a good governour, and in the administration of the affaires of a city, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themissocles at the comming in of the MBDBs counselled the people of Athens to go our of the city, to leave their lands and country, and to ship into galleyes, and fight with the barbarous people by fea in the straight of SALAMINA: as every man was wondering at his bold and venturous counsell, Cimon was the first manthat went with a life and iolity through the streete Ceramicus, vnto the castle, accompanied with his young familiars and companions, carrying a bit of a bridle in his hand to confectate vnto the goddeffe Minerua, fignifying thereby, that the city had no need of horfemen at that time, but of mariners and seamen. And after he had given vp his offering, he tooke one of the targets that hung vpon the wall of the temple, and having made his prayer vnto Minerua, came downe to the haven, and was thefirst that made the most part of the citizens to take a good heart to them, and couragioufly to leave the land, and take the fea. Befides all this, he was a man of a goodly stature, common feras Ion the Poet tellifieth, and had a faire curled haire and thicke, and fought so valiantly at the forage day of the battell, that he wan immediatly great reputation, with the love and good will of encrieman. So that many were still about him to encourage him to be lively and valiant, and to thinkethinceforth to do some acts worthy of the glory that his father had gotten at the battell of Marathon. And afterwards, so soone as he began to deale in matters of state, the people were marnellous glad of him, and were wearied with Themistocles: by meanes whereof Cimon was prefently aduanced and preferred to the chiefest offices of honour in the citie, being very well thought on of the common people, because of his soft and plaine nature. Moreover, Arifides also did greatly further his advancement, because he saw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vie him as a counterpoise to controle Themsfeeles craft and Houtnesse. Wherfore after the MEDES were fled out of GRECE, Cimon being fent for by the ATHENIANS for their General by sea, when the city of ATHENS had then no maner of rule nor commandemer, cimon gebut followed king Paulanias and the LACED AMONIANS: he euer kept his countreymen and the ather citizen in maruellous good order in all the voyages he made, and they were readier to do good manily feruice, then any other nation in the whole army whatfoeuer. And when king Paufanias had feapractifed with the barbarous people to betray GRECE, had written alfoto the king of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time dealt very cruelly and straightly with the confederates of his King Paucountry, and committed many insolent parts by reason of the great authoritie he had, and strong his should his foolish pride whereof he was full: Cimon farre otherwise, gently entertained them invited to whom Paufanias injured, and was willing to hearethem. So that by this his courteous manner, and prides the LACED EMONIANS having no eye to his doings, he stole away the rule and commandement of all GRECE from them, and brought the ATHENIANS to be fole Lords of all, not by and all forceand crueltie, but by his sweete tongue, and gracious manner of vsing all men. For the sherrale most part of the confederates being no longer able to away with Paulanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and submitted themselves under the protection of Cimon and Aristides : who did not onely receive them, but wrote also to the councell of the Ephores at LACEDEMON, that they should call Pausanias home, for that he dishonoured Sparta, and putall Grece to much troubleand warres. And for proofe hereof, they fay that king Paufanius being on a time in the city of BYZANCE, sent for Cleonice, a yong maiden of a noble house, to take his pleasure of her.

Her parents durst not keepe her from him, by reason of his cruelty, but suffered him to carry her away. The yong gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Pausanias chamber to take away the lights, and thinking in the darke to come to Paulanias bed that was afleepe, groping for the bed as foftly as she could to make no noise, she vnfortunately hit against the lampe, and ouerthrewit. The falling of the lampe made such ancise, that it waked him on the sudden, who thought ftraight therewithall that fome of his enemies had bene come traiteroufly to kill him, wherupon hetooke his dagger lying vnder his beds head, and so stabbed it in the young virgine, that she died immediatly vponit. Howbeit she neuer let Paulanias take rest after that, because her spirit came every night and appeared vnto him, as he would faine have flept, and spake this angerly to him in verse, as followeth:

Keepe thou thy selfe vpright, and instice see thou feare, For we and shame be water him, that instice downe doth beare.

This vile fact of his did fo stirrevp al the confederates hearts against him, that they came to be. fiege him in BIZANTIVM vnderthe conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithstanding bee. fcaped, and secretly faued himselse. And because that this maidens spirit would neuer let him rest, but vexed him continually, he fled vnto thecity of Heraclea, where there was a temple that conjured dead spirits, & there was the spirit of Cleanice conjured to pray her to be cotented, So she appeared vnto him, & told him that he should be deliuered of all his troubles so soone as he came to Sparta: figuifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he should suffer there, Diverse writers do thus report it, Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GRE-CIANS, which were come to him to take his part: was advertised that certaine greatme of Persin, and allied to the king himfelfe, who kept the city of Eione, vpon the river of Strymonin the countrey of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GRECIANS inhabiting there. abouts. Vpon which intelligence he took the sea with his armie, and went thither, whereat his first comming he vanquished and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: and having ouerthrowne them, draucall the rest into the city of EIONE. That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other fide of the river of Strymon, who did commonly victuall them of E10 x 2: and having driven them to for fake the countrey, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole himself. Whereupon he held them that were besieged at Eion E so straightly from victu. Botes bur- als, that Butes the king of Persians Lieutenat, despaying of the state of the city, let fire on the fame, and burnt him felfe, his friends, and all the goods in it. By reason whereof, the spoiletaken Jeffe, site, or that city was but small, because the barbarous people burnt all the best things in it with them for feare of felies: howbeit he conquered the countrey thereabouts, and gaue it to the ATHENIANS to inhabit, being a very pleasant and fertile soile. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS suffered him to confecrate and fet vp openly three Hermes of stone (which are foure square pillars) vpon the tops of the which they fet vp heads of Mercurie: vpon the first of the three pillars, this inscription is ingrauen.

The people truly were, of courage flout and fierce, Who having fout the Medes fast up (as stories do rehearse) Within the walled towne, of Esone that tide, Which on the streame of Strymon stands, they made them there abids The force of famines pinch, and therewith made them feele The dint of warre so many a time, with trustie tooles of steele: Till in the end, despaire so pierced in their thought, As there they did destroy themselues, and so were brought to nought.

Vpon the second there is such another:

The citizens which dwell in Athens stately towne, Have here fet up these monuments, and pictures of renowne, To honor (o the facts, and celebrate the fame, Their valiant chieftains did atchieue, in many a martiall game: That such as after come when they thereby perceine, How men of scruice for their deeds, didrich rewards receive, Encouraged may be, such men for to resemble, In valiant acts and dreadfull deeds, which makes their foes to tremble.

And vponthe third another:

When Menestheus did leade forth of this citie here, An armie to the Troian warres, (by Homer doth appeare) He was about the rest, that out of Gracia went, Avaliant knight, a worthie wight, a captaine excellent, To take in hand the charge, an armse for to quide : And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide. That praise of prowelle then (o grave Athenians) Is now no newes to fill the eares of thefe our citizens, Since through the world so wide, the fame and worthie praise, For martiall feates, to you of yore hath judged bene alwaies.

Now though Cimons name be not comprised in these inscriptions, yet they thought that this was a fingular honor to him at that time: for neither Miltiades nor Themistocles had ever the like. For when Militades requested the people one day that they would licence him to weare agarland of oliue boughes upon his head; there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, Sochares that flanding vp in open affembly spake against him, & said a thing that maruellously pleased the Decision people, though indeed it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good feruice he had done to the gang Mile commonwealth. When you have Miltiades (faid he) overcome the barbarous people alone in sades rebattell, then asketo be honoured alone alfo. But how was it then, that Cimons feruice was fo ac- quef for coptable to the Athenians? It was in mine opinion, because they had with other captaines of Olive fought to defend themselves and their countrey onely; and that under the conduction of Gimon, benghes. they had affaulted and driven their enemies home to their owne doores, where they conquered the cities of Eione & of Amphipolis, which afterwards they did inhabit with their own citizens, and wan there also the Ile of Scyros, which Cimon took evpon this occasion. The Dolo-PIANS did inhabit it, who were idle people, and lived without labour or tillage, & had bene ro- segrei. uers on the fea of a wonderful long time, vfing piracy altogether to maintaine themselues with al: to that in the end they spared not so much as the merchants and passengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine Thessalians that went thither to traffick. And whethey had taken their goods fro the, yet would they cast the in prison besides. Howbeit the prisoners foud means to cleape, & after they had faued themselues, repaired to the parliament of the Americations, which is a generall councell of all the states & people of GRECE. The America on the council of the states & people of GRECE. The America on the council of the states & people of GRECE. The America on the council of the states & people of GRECE. vnderstanding the matter, condemned the city of the Scyrians to pay a great sum of money. of the drive The citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, and bad them that robbed phistyons. the merchants and had the goods in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, because there was no other likelihood, but that the theeuesthe felues should be drive to answer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters ynto Cimon, and willed them to come with his army, & they would deliuer their city into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon having conquered the lland, draue out the Dolopians thence, and rid the sea Ægevm of all pirats thereby. That done, remebring that the ancient Thefeus, the fon of Ageus, flying from ATHEN'S came into that lland of Scyros, where king Lycomedes fuspecting his comming had traiterously slaine him: Cimon was maruellous carefull to feeke out his tombe, because the Athenians had an Oracle & prophecy, that commanded them to bring his ashes and bones backe againe to Athens, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knew not where he was buried, for that the inhabitats of the lland would never afore cofesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much ado found the tomb, put his bones aboord the Admirall galley fumptuously decked Thetes and set forth, and so brought him againe into his countrey, soure hundred yeares after These brought death. For this, the people thanked him maruellously, and thereby he wan exceedingly the A. brought broug THENIANS good wils and in memorie of him they celebrated the judgement of the tragicall yeares after playes of the Poets. For when Sophoeles the Poet, being a yong man had played his first tragedy, biscarb by Aphepson the prescioning there was great strife and contention amongst the lookers on, Sophoeles would not draw them by lots that should be Iudges of this play, to give the victory vnto that & Asia. Poetthat had best descrued: but when Cimon and the other captaines were come into the Thea-lim content ter to see the same (after they had made their accustomed oblations vnto the god, in honour of victory. whom these playes were celebrated) he stayed, and made them to minister an oath vnto ten (which were of every tribe of the people one) and the oath being given, he caused them to fit as ludges to give sentence, which of the Poets should carie away the prise. This made all the Poets

498 strine and contend who best should do, for the honour of the Iudges: but Sephocles by their sentence bare away the victory. But Aschylus (as they fay) was so angry and griened with all, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, but went for spite into SILICIA, where he died, and was buried neare vnto the city of GELA. Ion writeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO VINTO ATHENS, Supped one night with Cimon at Laemedons house, and that after Supper when they had giuenthe gods thanks, Cimon was intreated by the company to fing. And hedid fing with fo good a grace, that every man praifed him that heard him, and faid he was more curteous then Themssteeles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play upon the cithern, answered them, he was neuer taught to sing or play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich & mighty city. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to another, as it falleth out commonly in speech, they entred in talke of Cimons doings: and having rehearfed the chiefest of them, he himselfetold one, which was the notablest and wiscft part of all the rest that ever he played. For the ATHENIANS & their confederates together, having taken a great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIVM, the confederates to honour him withall, gaue him the preheminence to divide the spoyle amongst them. Whereupon he made the division, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by themselues, and layd the spoyles and their apparell by themselues, The confederates found this distribution very vnequall: but neuerthelesse Cimon gaue them the choise to chuse which of the two they would, and that the ATHENIANS should be conten-Harephytus ted with that which they left. So there was a Samian Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counfell rather to take the spoyles of the Persians, then the Persians themgane ceun. felues, and so they did: for they tooke the spoyle of the prisoners goods and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Wherupon Cimen was thought at that time of the common foldiers to be but an ill divider of spoile, because that the confederates carried away great store of chaines, carkanets, and bracelets of gold, and goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN faflion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labour. But shortly after, the parents and friendes of these prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed every man of them at a great ransome: so that Cimonga. thered fuch a masse of ready money together by their ransome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his galleys with the same for the space of four emoneths after, and left a great summe of mony besides in the sparing treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being now become rich, bestowed the goods which he had thus honourably gotten from the barbarous people, more honourably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens: for he brake vp all his hedges and inclosures and laid them plaine and open, that trauellers paffing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much fruite thereof as they would, without any manner of danger. And furthermore, he kept a continuall table in his house, not furnished with many dishes, but with meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore countrymen were daily refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinarie: so as they needed not otherwise care to labour for their liuing, cimons sha" apparelled, and if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the city, any old citizen poorely caried ener good flore of money about them; and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or elsewhere, knowing his pouerty, they secretly gaue him money in his hand, and faid neuer a word. Which the Poet felfe Crasinus feemeth to speake of, in a comedy of his intituled the Archiloches: I am Metrobius the secretarie, he Which did my selfe assure (in age) well cherished to be: At wealthie Cimons boord, where want was neuer found, Whose distributions and his almes did to the poore abound. There thought I for to passemine aged yeares away, With that right noble godly man, which was the Grecians stay.

but might be the readier, and haue the more leisure to serue the commonwealth. Yet Ariffoile the Philosopher writeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he keptthis ordinarie table; but for his poore towns men only in the village of Lacia, where he was borne.

Furthermore, he had alwaies certain young men waiting on him of his houshold servants well arrayed, he made one of these young men strip himselfe, and change apparell with the oldman,

& that was very well thought of, and they all honoured him for it. Moreouer these young men

Furthermore,

Furthermore, Gorgias Leontine faid, that Cimon got goods to vie them, and that he vied them to be How Cimon honoured by them. And Critics that was one of the thirty tyrants of ATHENS, he wisheth and defireth of the gods in his Elegies:

The goods of Scopas heires, the great magnificence, And noble heart of Cimon, he who spared none expence: The glorious victories and high triumphant showes, Of good Agefilaus king : good gods, oh grant me those.

The name of Lichas SPARTAN hath bene farmous among ft the GRECIANS and yet we know no The boffs. other cause why, saving that he vsed to feast strangers that came to LACED #MON on their festiuallday, to feethesports and exercises of the young men dancing naked in the citie. But the Sparan. magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceed the ancient liberality, courtesie, and hospitality of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the first menthat taught the GRECIANS throughout al GRECE, how they should fow corne, and gather it to maintaine themselves with al, & also shewed them the vie of wels, and how they should light and keepe fire. But Cimon making an hof- cinons pitall of his own house, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permitting strangers that trauelled by his grounds, to gather such fruits there as the time and season of the yeare yeelded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goods to be common among fithem, brought as the Poets say they were in the old time of Saturnes reigne. And now, where some accused this the golden honest liberality of Cimon, objecting that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and world ato win their good wils by that meanes: the manner of life he led, accompanying his liberalitie. didutterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke part with the Nobility, and lived after the LACEDEMONIANS manner, as it well appeared, in that he was alwaies against Themissocies, who without all compasse of reason increased the authority & power of the people; and for this cause he joyned with Aristides, and was against Ephiaties, who would for the peoples fake have put downe and abolished Areopagus Court. And whereall other gouernours in his time were extortioners and bribe-takers, (Arifides and Epialtes onely excepted)he to the contrary led an vncorrupt life in administration of iustice, and euer had cleane cimens in hands, what soeuer he spake or did for the state and commonwealth, and would therefore neuer take mony of any man living. And for proofe hereof, we find it writte, that a nobleman of Per-SIA called Refaces, being a traitor to his mafter the king of Persia fled on a time vnto Athens, Refaces atwhere being continually baited and wearied with the common accusations of these tale-bearers temptades and picke-thankes that accused him to the people, he repaired at the length vnto Cimen, and brought him home to his owne doore two bolles, the one full of darickes of gold, and the other of darickes of filuer, which be peeces of money fo called, because that the name of Darins was Darickes written upon them. Cimon feeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he salled. would rather chuse, to have him his friend or his hireling. The barbarous nobleman answered him, that he had rather have him his friend. Then faid Cimon to him againe, Away with thy gold A mblo and filuer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy friend, that gold and filuer shall euer be at my com- saing of mandement, to take and dispose it as I have need. About that time began the confederates of the ATHENIANS to be weary of the wars against the barbarous people, desiring thenceforth to line quietly, and to have ley fure to manure and husband their grounds, and to trafficke also, considering that they haddriven their enemies out of their countrey, and that now they did them no more hurt; by reason whereof they payed the mony they were sessed at, but they would furnish no moe men nor ships as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the ATHENIANS compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and profecuted law against them that failed Paiment, condemning them in great fines, and that fo cruelly, that they made the feigniorie and dominion of the ATHENIAN'S hatefull vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimentooke acontrary courfeto them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take mony and void ships of them that would not, or could not ferue in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become flouthfull mongrels in their houses, by too much rest, and to transpose themselues from good foldiers which they had bene, to labourers, merchants, & farmers, altogether altered from The benefit armes and wars, through the beaftly flothfull defire they had to live pleafantly at home. And fruite: and cotrarily, causing a great number of the ATHENIANS one after another to serve in gallies, he so she discome acquainted them with continual pains in his voyages, that he made them in short space become modifie of lords & masters oner them that gaue them pay & entertainment, For they began by litle & litle dieness.

to ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to have it quickly fent him, fearing left he should returne into Italie vponany occasion, whilehe was Confull. For he thought that if he returned againe to Rome with fo great an armie, he would eafily do what he lift: and the rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at Rome, because he spake and did al that pleased the common people, being a vicious liver, and dissolutely giuen, for which cause Luculins hated him. But there was another common Oraton among the people, called Lucius Quintius, and he would have had all Syllaes doings revoked and broken: amatter to alter euen the whole state of the commonwealth, and to turmoile the citie of Rome againe with civill differtion, which then lived quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintius Lucullus talked withall apart, to perswade him, and openly reproued him with such words, that he was diffwaded from his euill purpose, & by reason ruled his rash ambition, handling it both wifely and cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the common-wealth) because it was the beginning of a discase, from whence infinite troubles were like to grow. While these things were thus in hand, newes came that Othanins the Gouernour of Citicia was dead. Straight whereupon many put forward themselues to sue for this charge, and to count Cetheans, as the onely man who aboue all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckening of the gouernment of CILICIA in respect of the country, but because CAPPADOCIA was hard adioyning to it: and perswading himselfe that if he could obtain the government thereof, they would give none other (but himfelfente authority to make wars with Mithridates: he determined to procure al the meanes he could, that none should have it but himselfe. And having proved fundry waies, was compelled in the end against his owne nature, to practise a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deutse to obtaine his defire. There was a woman in Rome atthat time called Pracia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasant grace in talke and discourse. howbeit otherwise vnchastafter curtisan maner. But because she employed the credit and fanor of them that frequented her company, to the benefit and feruice of the commonwealth, and of them that loued her: she wan the report (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauour and further any good enterprife, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common. wealth at his pleafure) and brought him to be fo farre in fancy with her, that he could not beout of her fight: then had she all the whole power and authority of Rome in her hands, for the people did nothing but Gethegus preferred it, and Gethegus did what euer Precia wold will him to do. Thus Lucullus fought to come in fauour with her, sending her many prefents, and vsing all other courtefies he could offer vnto her: befides that it feemed a great reward for fo proud and ambitious a woman as she, to be fued vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meanes cameto haue Cethegus at his commandement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucallus in all affemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA: who after it was once grated him, had then no need of the help neither of Precia, nor yet of Cethegus. For the people wholy of themselues with one consent did grant him the charge to make war with Mithridates, because he knew better how to ouercome him then any other Captaine, and because that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in Spaine, and Metellus also growne too old, both which two were the only men that could deservedly have cotended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Confull, made such sute to the Senate, that they sent him also with an army by sca, to keepe the coasts of Proportide, & to defend the country of Bithynia, Thus Lucullus having this commission, went into As IA with one legion onely, the which heleauied anew at Rom E: and when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he found there, which were men marred and corrupted altogether of long time, through couetousnesse and delicacy of the country. For amongst others, were the bands which they called § Fimbrian bands, radistate men ginen ouer to selfe-will, and very ill to be ruled by martiall discipline, because they hadliued a long time at their owne liberty, without all obedience to any man. They were those selfe fouldiers that together with Fimbria, fluetheir general Flaccus, Conful of the ROMAINE people, and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria himselfe, and forsooke him, leaving him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitours, and wicked people, howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trained, and painefull fouldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in short time bridled their boldnesse meetly well and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Captaine and Generall meant, that knew how to command; but were yied to flattering leaders, that commanded the fouldiers no more then they themselues liked of. Now concerning the state of the enemics, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bold (as these flourishing Sophisters commonly are) vndertaking warre against the Romaines, with a vaine vnprostrable armie, but passing fresh and sumptuous to the maintage. eye: after he was once foyled and ouercome, with no leffe shame then losse, when he came tearing and the state of the stat to make his fecond warre, he cut off all superfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a connenient furniture to scrue for warres at all assayes. For he put by the confused multitude of sundry nations, the fierce threatnings of the barbarous people in fo many fundry tongues, and clearely banish also the rich grauen armours with goldimiths worke, and set with precious stones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wan them, then gaue strength or courage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMAINE fashion, and great heavy shields, & brought to the field a maruellous number of horse, more ready for service, then richin furniture. Then he joyned sixescore thousand sootemen together, appointed and fet in order like vnto the battell of the Romain is with fixteene thousand horse of feruice, befides those that drew his armed carts with fithes about, which were in all to the number of an hundred. And befides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of ships and galleys together, which were not decked with goodly golden paulions, as at the first, neither with stones nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and Gentlewomen: but furnished full of armour, artiletie, and slings, and with money also to paythe fouldiers. With all this army and preparation, he went first to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, and not those onely, but all the other cities of Asia wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miferies and diseases, by the cruchic of the Romaine farmers and vourcers, who raising taxes and imposts vpon them, made micros by them abide vntollerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the the Romane Harpye, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mouthes: how beit at that time he did "Feres." no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he vsed vnto them, and qualified a little the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to renolt. Now Lucullus being busic about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Contains Confull (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offeredhim to do notable service, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes stilled brought him from fundry places, that Lucullus was with his armie in Phrygia, and comming tenthal. towards him: yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honour of triumph assured alreadic in his hands, and because Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he advanced forwards to gine battel. But Mithridates ouercame him both by sea and land so that Cotta by sea lost threescore of his ships with all the men in them, foure thousand footmen by land, and was after with shame shut vp and besieged in the citie of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelessetoescape, but by Lucullus onely aide and meanes. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leaue Cotta, and to goe further, assuring him that he should finde the Realme of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: fo that he might casily be Lord of the whole. And these were the words of the souldiers that spited Cotta, because his foolish rashnesse and fond imagination had not onely brought those men to the shambles to be slaine and cast away, whom he had the leading of: but had let them also, that they could not ouercome him, and end this warre without blowes, for that they were driven to goto his helpe. Howbeit Lucullus making an oration vnto them, answered, that he had rather The godding of fauethe life of one Romaine citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And Liveline when Archelaus (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in Boeotia in the first warres against for the fac-Sylla, and now in the second warre tooke part with the Romaines) assured him that so some wing of a as they will be in the Romaines. as they faw him in the Realme of Pontvs, they would all rife against Mithridates, and yeeld themselves vnto him: Lucullus answered him thus, that he would not shew himselfe more fearefull then the good hunters, which neuer suffer the beast to recouer his denne. And when he had so said, he marched with his armie towards Mithridates, having in all his campe thirty thousand footmen, and two thousand fine hundred horse. When he came so neare vnto his enemies, that he might easily at eye discerne all their host, he wondered at the great multitude of fouldiers that were in their campe, and was in mind to giue battell, supposing yetthat the better way was to prolong time, and draw these warres out in length. But one Ma. rius a Romaine captaine, whom Sertorius had fent out of Spaine vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of fouldiers, came forwards, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his part did put his men also in readinesse to fight: but euen as both battels were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the sudden, without any shew of change of weather discerned before, and they plainely faw a great flake of fire fall betweene both armies, in forme and shape much like to a tunne, and of the colour of molten filuer. This celestiall figne put both the armies in fuch a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroake: and this wonderfull fight fortuned (as they fay) in a place of Phrygia, called Otryes. Now Lucullus afterwards confidering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world, that could suffice to victuall so many thousands of people as Mithridates had in his campe any long time together, having his enemies campe so lying before them: willed that one of the priloners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabbin, then what corne he had left in their cabbin. And when the prisoner had answered to all his demands, he returned him to prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their corne, and other proportion of victuals they had, with the number of menthe same should maintaine; he found that all would be spent in three or source daies at the vttermost. Whereupon he relied on his sirst determinatio, to delay time without hazard of battel. So he caused a maruellous deale of wheat to be brought into his campe out of euery quarter, that the same being throughly victualled, he might easily tarry the occasion which his enemies necessity should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, fought which way he might take the city of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowne before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thoufand men, and ten of their ships. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterprife, Mithridates stole away by night after supper, taking the opportunity of a dark rainie night, and marched thitherwards with such speed, that he was before the city of Cyzzevs by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastria standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall destinies. Lucullus receiving intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight wayes step by step, and being glad that he was not met with all of his enemies in disorder, lodged his army in a village call Thracia, in a place of great aduantage for him, and commodiously seated also vpon the high wayes, and throughfare of the neighbours thereabours, by the which they must come of necessitie to victuall Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucullus wifely foreseeing what would follow, wouldnot keepe his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had wel trenched & fortified his camp, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, told them openly by manifelt demonstration of assured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would give victorie into their hands, and that without losse of one drop of bloud. In the meane season, Mithridates environned the Grecians round about by land, having devided his armie into ten campes, and stop-ped vp the mouth of the arme of the sea, which devided the city from sirme land, with his ships from one fide to another. Now the CYZICENIANS were valiant men, and determined to abide all extremitie for the Romaines sakes: but one thing onely troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe stood in such a place, wherethey might easily discerne it from the city. But Mithre-The Brata- dates fouldiers deceived them; for shewing them the ROMAINES campe that lay above hard by them, they said vnto them: do ye see yonder campe there: They are the MEDES, and the AR-MENIANS, Whom Tigranes hath fent to the aide of Mithridates. These words put the Cyzi-CENIANS in a maruellous feare, seeing such a multitude of enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax; whom Archelan fent vnto them, but they would not beleeue him at the first, taking it for a tale, onely to make them to be of good courage, and valiantly abide the furie of the fiege: vntill such time as a link boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had taken him prisoner, was come against vnto them. Of whom they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they iested to aske that question of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMAINES campe with his finger: then they beleeved it indeed, and were couragious againe. There is a lake neare vnto the citie of Cyzrovs called Dascylitide, and it is nauigable with conucnient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in a carr, and fo caried it to the fea, and there put as many fouldiers in her as she could welcarry, who by night entred into the citie, the skoute of the enemies neuer descrying them. This small suppliedid maruellously comfort the befreged Crzicenians; and it seemeth that the gods, delighting to see their noble courage, would further increase and assure the same, by many manifell tokens which they fent from heaven, and specially by one, which was this. The day of the feaft of Proferpina was at hand, and the citizens had never a blacke cow to offer in solemne sacrifice, as their ancient ceremonies required: fo they made one of paste, and brought it hard vnto the altar. Now, the cow that was vowed to this facrifice, & which they reared up of purpole A wanderto frue for that day, was feeding among ft the heard of the city in the fields on the other fide of full token thearme of the sea. But that day she kept alone from all the rest of the heard, and swam ouer the arme of the fea, and came into the city; where the went of her felfevnto the place of the facrifice. to offer her Furthermore, the goddeffe Proferpina her felf appeared vnto Ariftagorax in his dreame, Secretary file to the of the state and commonwealth of the Cyzic Enians, and said vnto him: I am come hither to be serito bring the flute of Lye is against the trumpet of Pont, and therefore tell the citizens from field. me, that I will them to be of good courage. The next morning when the Secretarie had told driftage. them this vision, the Cyzicenians maruelled much at the goddesses words, and could not imagine what they meant. How beit at the breake of day there arofe a great whittling wind, that made the fea billowes rife very high; and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the city to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSALIAN enginer had made and deuised) began to make such a noise, and to breake in peeces by the roughnesse of the winde, that a man might easily judge what would follow upon it. Then all at one instant, the Southwind was become so vehement bigge, that in a moment it burst all these engines as funder, & specially a tower of wood of the height of an hundred cubits, which the wind shooke so vehicmently, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is sayd fur. thermore, that in the city of ILIVM the goddeffe Minerua appeared vnto diuerse in their sleepe, all in a fweat, and shewing part of her yeile torne, as if she had bene newly returned from giving aide unto the Cyzicenians: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of Ilium haue a pillar yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetual memorie. Now was Mithridates maruellous forrie for the breaking and losse of his engines, by meanes whereof, the Cyzicenians had escaped the danger of assault, and of the siege in like manner, vntill he truly vaderstood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreme dearth to be such, Extreme as the fouldiers were compelled to eate mans flesh, which (his Captaines abusing him) had for famine in a time kept secret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth indeed, he left off his vaine ambition oblinately to continue fiege: knowing well that Lucullus made not wars Provided with threats, and brauery, but (as the common prouer be faith) leapt on his bellie with both his bis belly feete, that is to fay, he did what he could possible to cut off all the victuals from him. And there with bath forcone day when Lucullus was gone to affault a caftle that troubled him, very neare vnto his bis feete. campe, Mithridates because he would not lose that oportunity, sent the most part of his horsemen to get victuals in BITHYNIA, with all the carts, and beafts of carriage, and his most vnprofitable footmen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the selfe same night vnto his campe, and the next morning betimes being in the winter feafon, followed them by the tracke with ten enfignes of footemenonely, and all his horsemen. But the snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sharpe, and the weather so rough, that many of his souldiers not being able to abide it, died by the way. For all that, he marched on still, till he ouertooke his enemies about the river of Rindacus, where he gaue them such an ouerthrow, that the very women came out of the Rindacus ft. city of Apollonia, and wentto steale the victuals they had loden, and to strip the dead, which were a maruellous great number as a man may judge in such a case: and neuerthelesse there were taken fixe thousand horse of service, an infinite number of heasts for carriage, and Lucullus fifteenethousand men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his campe, and passed hard Mintides by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the Historiographer Saluft, who writing of suborte. this matter faith, that here was the first time that euer the Romains faw any camels. Methinks men. it strange how he should thinke so, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the Great under Scipio, and the others that a little before had fought against Archelaus, neare unto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHERONEA, should not have seene camels. But to returne a gaine to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, refolued with himselfeimmediatly to flie, with all the speed he could possibly make: and to entertaine and stay Lucullus for atime behind him, he determined to fend Aristonicus his Admirall with his armie by sea, into the fea of GRECE. But as Aristonicus was readie to hoise faile, his owne men betrayed him, and deliuered him into the hands of Lucullus, with ten thousand crownes which he caried with him to corrupt (if he could) part of the ROMAINS army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by fea, leaving the rest of his army by land in the hands of his captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the river of Granicus, where he let vponthem, & after he had flaine twenty thousand of them, tooke an infinite number prisoners. And they say there died in entribyone that wars, what fouldiers, what flaues, what lackeis, & other stragglers that followed the camp, about the number of three hundred thousand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the city of Cyzicvs, where after he had spent some daies, enjoying the glory due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visit the coast of Helles PONT, to get ships together, and to prepare an army by sea. And passing by Troade, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he flept in the night, it feemed to him he faw the goddeffe appeare before him, which faid these verses vnto him:

O lyon fierce and flout why fleepest thou so sound? Since at thy hand so faire a prey, is readie to be found. Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, told them the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came some vnto him from the city of ILIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene galleys of king Mithridates, having five oares to every banke, that were feene in the haven of the ACHAIANS, and that failed towards the Ile of Lemnos. Whereupon Lucullus tooke ship straight, went and tooke them energy one: for at his first comming he slue the captaine called 1 stdorus, and went afterwards to the other mariners that lay at anker on the coast side, who seeing him come, drew towards land with their ships, in purpose to runne them all ashore, and fighting aboue hatches, hurt many of Lucullus fouldiers, because they could not compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had laied their ships was such as there was no way to force them before, their galleys floting in the fea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lycullus with much ado all this notwithstanding, found meanes in the end to put ashore certaine of the best souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily land. These fouldiers went straight and set vpon the enemies behind, slue some of them even at their first comming, and compelled the reft to cut a funder the cables that fast ned the galleys to the banks. But when they thought to flie from land, the galleys brused and broke one another: and that worst of all was, ranne vpon the points and spurres of Lucullus galleys: and so many of them as ftood aboue hatches were flaine, the resttaken prisoners: amongst whom, Marius the Romaine captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had fent out of SPAINE vnto Mithridates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commanded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye, because Marius should not die so happie a death, as to be flaine, but that he should die some shamefull death, and be condemned by order of law. That done, Lucullus went in person with all the speed he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to find him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Voconius should have stayed him: for he had sent this Vocanius before with a great number of his ships vnto the city of NICOMEDIA, to stop him from slying. But hetaried so long in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA facrificing to the gods of the same, and to be received into the fraternitie of their religion, that he could never after come neare Mithridates to stop him from flying: having alreadie made faile with all the whole fleete, and hafting with all possible speed to recouer the Realme of Pontes, before Lucullus could return from whence he went. But in failing thitherwards, he met with fuch a terrible ftorme, that carried part of his ships so away, that they ranne straggling to seeke their fortune, and part of them splitted and drowned outright: so that all the coastes and rivers thereabouts, for many daies after, were full of dead bodies and shipwrackes cast ashore by waves of ses in great the sea. Now for Mithridates owne person, he was in a ship of great burthen, the which for her danger ap. greatnesse could not faile neare the shore, nor recouer land, she was also very euill to be guided b) timpeft, by the pilots in so boisterous a storme: the marriners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge: and the ship her selfe moreouer tooke in such store of water, and was so heavily charged withall, that they durft no more put her out to the fea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to go aboord a little pinnace of pirats, and to put himselfe and his life into their hands, by whose helpe in the end (beyond all expectation, but not without great danger) he got to land, and recourred the city of HERACLEA in the Realme of PONTYS. Now here is to benoted, that the great brauerie Lucullus shewed vnto the Senate of Rome, fell out according to his imagination by the fauour of the gods. For when the Schare had appointed for ending of these warres, to prepare a great name of ships, and therewithall had given order also for three thousand talents: Lucullus stayed them by letters, that they should not do it, writing branely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be strong inough to drive Mitbridates from the fea, with the onely ships he would borrow of their friends and confederates. And indeed, through the special fauour of the gods, he brought it Lucultur fotopasse: for they say, that this terrible storme that destroyed the armie of Mithridates was raifed vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the Realme of Pontys, because they had ble. dellroyed her temple in the city of PRIAPOS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diverse that counselled Lucallus to deferre the rest of this warre vntill another season; but notwithstanding all their perswasions, he went through the countrey of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to innade the Realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the first beginning he lacked vichials, so that there were thirty thousand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried e- Lucullus uery one of them a bushell of wheate on their shoulders: howbeit entring farther into the countrey, and conquering the whole, there was such exceeding plenty of all things, that an oxe was An oxe fold in his campe but for a Drachma, and a flaue at four erimes as much. And of all other spoyle bought for there was fuch great flore, that either they made no reckoning of it, or else they made hauock of it, because there was no man to sell it vnto, every man having so much of his owne. For they ran ouerall the countrey vnto the city of THEMISYRA, and to the valleys that lay vpontheriuer of Thermodon, and stayed no where longer then they were a spoyling. Therupon the souldiers beganto murmure at Lucullus, because he affured all the cities vpon composition, & neuer took any of Lucullus of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich themselues by spoyle: and yet said they, fuldiers. he would make vs now go farther, & leave Amrs vs a great rich city which we might eafily take by force, if it were but a little straightly besieged; and leade vs into the deserts of the TIBARE-MIANS and the CHALD ÆIANS to fight against Mithridates. Lucullus passed ouer all these complaints, and made no reckoning of them, because he would neuer haue thought that they would haue fallen into fuch mutinie and furie, as afterward they did: and contrarily excufed himfelfe the more carefully to them that blamed and reproued him, for his long tarying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckoning, & fuffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather Lucultus anew force & army together at his pleasure. For, said he, that is the marke I shoot at, & that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I do, wishing nothing more, then that he might once again his souldiers make himselfe strong, and bring a second armie to the field, that might embolden him to come eftsoones to fight with vs, and runne away no more. Do you not lee, faid he, that at his backe helath an infinite number of defert countries, where it is vnpassable euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him also the mount Caucasus, and many other vnpassible places, which are fulficient not onely to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings besides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a little way from the countrey of the CABIRENIANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whose power is so great, that he driveth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth wholetownes and cities of GRECE vnto the Realme of MEDIA, and hath all Syria and Pa-1 ÆSTINE in his hands, and hath flaine and rooted out the kings and fuccetfours of the great Seleucus, and hath carried away their wives and daughters prisoners by force. This great and mighty king is allied vnto Mithridates, for he married Mithridates daughter; and it is not like- king of dr. ly that when Mithridates shall come and intreate him to helpe him in his distresse, that Tigra-menia, mas nes will refusehim, but rather we must thinke certainely that he will make warres vpon vs in ried Mihis defence. And thus, in making haste to drive out Mithridates, we shall bring our selves into daughter, great danger, to prouoke a new enemie, euen Tigranes against vs, who of long time hathlurked " for a just occasion to make warres with vs. and he can haue no honester cause to take armes, then " to defend and keepe aking his neighbour, and so neare a kinsman, from veterdestruction, and « onethat is compelled to feeke vnto him for fuccour. What need we then to prouble him to 22) procure it, & teach Mithridates (which he purpofeth not) to whom he should repaire for aide, to make warres against our selues: and pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with our owne hands into the way to go seeke aide of Tigranes, which of himselfe he will neuer do (thinking it a dishonor vnto him) vnlesse we drive him to it for very necessity? Is it not better for vs togine him leifure and time, to gather a fecond force againe of himfelfe, and his owne people, that we might rather fight with the Colchians, TIBARENIANS, CAPPADOCIANS, & with fuch other people whom we have so many times overcome: then with the MEDE's and ARMENIANS With this determinatio Lucullus taried a great while before the city of Amisvs, continuing this fiege of purpose, without distressing them at all. Afterwards when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the fiege, and himselfe with the rest of his army went to meete Mishridates: who had planted his campe neare vnto the city of CARIRA, determining to tarrie the Ro-MAINES comming, having gathered together againe a new army of forty thousand footemen and foure thousand horsemen, in the which he put his most considence and trust, so that he past fed ouer the river of Lycus, and went and presented battell to the Romaine s in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, and the ROMAINS had the worse: for there was one Pomponius a ROMAINE taken, of great estimation, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was Mithridates asked him, if in fauing his life, and healing his wounds, he would become his feruant & friend. Straight replied Pomponius, With all my heart, quoth he, so that thou make peace with the ROMAINES: if not, I will cuer be thine enemie. The king esteemed his courage much, and would do him no hurt. And as for Lucullus he was afraid to come into the plaine, because hise. nemy was the stronger of horsemen; & he doubted also on the other side to take his way by the mountaine, because it was very high, vneasie to clime, and full of woods and forrests. But as he ftood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GRECIANS by chance that were fled, and hidden in a caue hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promifed Lucullus if he would beleeue and follow him, he would bring him into a fure strong place to lodge his campe, where was a castle about the city of CABIRA. Lucallus beleeved the old mans words, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in the campe, and went his way: and after they had passed certaine straight and dangerous waies of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place where Artemidorus had promised to bring him. Now the enemies were marvellously amazed when day light came, to fee him there over them, in a place where if he list to fight, he might come vpon them with advantage: and if he liked not to stirre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stood indifferent then to hazard battell, or not. But in the meane season, they fay certaine of the kings campe by chance were a hunting the Hart. The Romaines perceining that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this meane one to charge another in such sort (relief growing still on either side) as Mithridates men grew the stroger. But the Romaines feeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe aboue, werein fuch a rage, that they all ran in a choler to Lucullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and give them a fignall to fight. Lucullus, because he would shew them by experience how much the presence and eye of a good wise captaine in time of need was worth; commanded them they should not once stirre, and he himselfe in person went downe into the valley, where he commanded the first of his men he met withall slying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they prefently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chase, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne fort. Afterwards vpon this returne againe to his campe, he set his souldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to shame them withall, which the ROMAINES are wont to vie in fuch a case; and that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote long, being in their shirts, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeing them do it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARDARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vponthe marifles of The Darda - Mæotin) a noble gentleman of his person, valiant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudgement to do any great enterprise, as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainement in company, knowing how to fashion himselfe with all men. This prince, being alwaies at strife withother Lords of the countrey, and contending who should have the first place of honor and favour about the king : went vnto Mithridates, and promifed him that he would do him notable service, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus. The king was very gladof this promife, and praised him maruellously in secret howbeit openly of purpose he did him many injuries; because he might haue some colour to counterfeit anger and displeasure, and to give way for him to go yeeld himselfe vnto Lucullus, as he did. Lucullus was maruellous glad of him, because he was one of the chiefest men of name in all his campe: Lucullus and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediately: in the which he behaued himfelfe fo well, that Lucullus greatly effeemed his wisdome; and commended his diligence, in such fort, conspiracio. that he did him this honour, to call him sometimes vnto the Councell, and make him sit at his boord. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occasion Othacus to execute his enterprise, hee commaunded his foremen to be readily with his horse out of the prince of the Dardatrenches of the campe: and at noone daies when the fouldiers tooke rest, and slept here and rians. there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to have found no body there to keepe him from comming in confidering the familiarity Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of: and fure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if fleepe that casteth away so many other Captaines, had not then preserved and faued Lucullus that flept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the doore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lucullus being wearied by firste. with trauell and lack of sleepe, was but then newly layed downe to rest. Olthacus, what soeuer the other faid to him, would not be fo answered, but told him, he would come in whether he would or not, for he must needs speake with him in a matter of great importance. Menedemus answered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessarie, then the preservation of his masters life and health, who had need to take rest: and with these words hethrust him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was afraid then, and withdrew himselfe secretly out of the trenches of the campe, tooke his horse backe, and rode straight to Mit bridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was to kill Lucullus. And thus it plainely appeareth, that occasion, and opportunity of time euen in great matters delivereth meanes to save or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines given vnto the sicke and diseased perfons. Shortly after, Lucullus fent one of his Captaines, called Sornatius, to get victuals, with ten ensignes of footmen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his taile one of his Captaines also, called Menander, vnto whom Sornatius gaue battell, and flue him, with great flaughter of his men befide. And afterward Lucullus sent another of his Lieutenants, called Adrianus, with a great company of fouldiers, to get victuals into his campe more then he shouldneed. Mithridates did not let slip this occasion, but sent after him two of his Captaines allo, called Menemachus and Myron, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horfemen. Lucultus all which were flaine, two onely excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: pellor, of the which he fought to falue as well as he could, faying that the loffe was much leffe then it was Mibrida. thought for, and that it fortuned through the ignorance and raffinesse of his Lieutenants. But tes captains Adrianus at his returne passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiestie, carrying ahuge number of carts loaden with corne and spoyles he had wonne: which draue Mithrida. to selfe into so great a despaire, and all his people into such a scare and trouble, that he presently determined to remouethence. Whereupon, the Nobility and fuch as had place of credite a- Milbridabout him, began to fend before, and fecretly to conuey their stuffe out of the campe, but veterly men and prohibiting others to do the same. The rest of the souldiers seeing the soutnesse of the Kings familian, minions, began to fet upon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once cause of to iffue out of the campe. This mutiniegrew to fuch a fury, that they ouerthrew their carriages and fumpter moyles, and flue them presently. Amongst others there was slaine Dorylaus, of bin whole one of the chiefest Captaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple army. gowne, for the which they killed him: and Hermans the Priest of the sacrifices was troden vnder foote, and smothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in fo great dilorder. The King himselfe amongst others fled; but having neuer 2 one of his guard about him, nor any of the squires of his stableto bring him a horse, Ptolomie, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted off his owne horse, and gaue him the King, but even in manner too late. For the ROMAINES that followed him counters fires were then euen hard at his taile: and it was not for lacke of speed they missed the taking of him, throw of for they were very neare him; but the couetoufnesse of the souldiers was the losse of the prey foodiers.

they had fo long fought for, with fo great paine and hazard of battels, and deprived Lucullus of the honour and reward of all his victories. For they were so neare vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so little further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and filuer (whether by chance, or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely abandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the middest of the high way betwixt him that fled, and the Romaines that followed, who stayed there to rob the gold and filuer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meanes wan ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neare him againe. And this losse was not all which the conetosnesse of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For one of the chiefest Secretaries of the King being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucallus commanded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had flue hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedinesse of them, slue him by the way; and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle and destroy the whole campe of theirenemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus tooke the city of CARTEA, and many other castels and ftrong places, where he found great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the G_{RB} -CIANS, and many Princes a kinne vnto the king himselfe, which were thought to be deadlong before; and then feeing themselues delinered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefite of Lucullus, thought with themselues they were not onely taken out of prison, but reniued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates fisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her; because all Mitbridates other wives and sisters whom they placed farthest off, as out of all danger (& sent into a country of greatest safety, neare vnto the city of Pharnacia) died pitifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sentone of the groomes of his privile chamber vnto them, called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must al die. Amongst many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kings sisters, called Roxane and Statira, which were forty yeares old apecce, and yet had neuer bene married; and two of his wines also whom he had maried, both of the country of Ionia, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CHIO, and the other Monime, in the city of MILETVM. Monime, she was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being far in loue with her, in so much as he sent her fifteene thousand crownes at one time, yet she would neuer giue care vnto his suite, vntill such time as the mariage was agreed vpon betweene them,& that he had fent her his Diademe or royall band, and called her by the name and title of Queene. This poorelady after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a wofull life, bewailing continually her accurfed beauty, that in flead of a husband, had procured her a mafter. & in flead of the matrimonial company which a noble woman should enjoy, had gotten her a gard & garrison of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, farre from the sweete country of Greenin change whereof, she had but a dreame and shadow of the hoped goods she looked for, having vnfortunately left them within her owne country she happily enjoyed before. Now whenthis Bacchides was come vnto them, and had commanded them from the king to chuse what manner The courage of death they would, and which every one of them thought most easie, and least painefull: Me of Monimos nime pluckt off the royall band from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her felfe, but the band not being firong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cryed out 0 cursed and wicked tiffue, wilt thou not yet serue me to end my forrowfull dayes. And speaking these words, cast it on the ground, and spit vpon it, & held out her throate to Bacchides to becut asunder. The other, Berenice, she took a cup full of poyso, her mother being present, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it off betweene them. The force of the poyfon was strong enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not so quickly to destroy the daughter, because shee had not taken that proportion which would have seruedher turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, vntill such time as Bacchides hasting to difpatch her, she in the end did strangleher selfe. As for the Kings two sisters, Roxane and Statina, which were virgins yet vnmaried, they say, that one of them also dranke poyson, curfing and derer juje. The current teffing the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an ill word, nor was faint harted of Stairs, or forrowfull to die, but cotrarily did commend & thank her brother highly, that feeing himfelf in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was carefull to cause them die, before they should fall as slaues into the hands of their enemies, and before they could come to dishonour them, or do them villanie. These pitifull misfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was courteous and gentle of nature: neuerthelesse he went on farther, still following Mithridates at the heeles: vnto the citic of TALAVRA. And there understanding that he was fled foure dayes before unto Tigranes in Armenia, returned backe againe, having first subdued the Chaldeans, and the Tiba-RENIANS, taken Armenia the leffe, and brought the cities, caftles and strong places vnto his obedience. That done, he fent Appius Clodius vnto king Tigranes to fummon him to deliuer Appius Clodius Mithridates vnto him: and himfelfe tooke his journey towards the city of Amisvs, which motives was yet belieged. The cause why this siege continued so long, was the sufficiency & great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus, who ynderstood so well how Lucultus. all forts of engines of batterie were to be vsed, and was so subtill besides in all inventions that goderner of might serve to defenda place besieged, as he troubled the Romaines much in this attempt; 600/100. but afterwards he was not onely met withall, and payed home for all his labour, but also outreached by Lucullus for all his fineneffe. For where before he had alwaies vied to found the retreate at a certaine houre, and to call his men backe from the affault to reft them: one day he brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden, and comming to affault the wall, at the first charge wanne a brake that order on the fudden was a brake that order on the fudden was a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order of the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that order or the first charge wanne a brake that or the first charge wanne a brake that or the first charge wanne a brake that or the first c peece of it, before those within could come in time to refist them. Callimachus seeing that, and fm. knowing it was now vnpossible to keepethe city any longer, forsooke it. But before his departing he fet the city on fire, either for malice to the ROMAINES, because he would not they calling. should enrich themselues with the facke of so great a city; or else for a policie of warre to haue this setteth the more leisure to sauchimselse, and sie. For no man gaue eye to them that sted by sea, be- amisur, caule the flame was fogreat, that it dispersed it selfe even to the very wals, and the Romains fouldiers, they onely prepared to spoyle. Lucullus seeing the fire without, had compassion of Lucullus thecity within, and would gladly have holpen it, and for the purpose prayed the souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, every one gaping after the spoile, words to making great noyfe with clashing of harnesse, and being very loude besides otherwise, till at wish. the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to spoyle, hoping thereby to saue the housesfrom fire, but it fell out cleane controrie. For the fouldiers themselues in seeking all about with torches and linkes lighted, to fee if any thing were hidden, they fet a number of houfeson fire. So as Lucullus comming into the city the next morning, and feeing the great defolationthe fire had made, fella weeping, faying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought sylla happie, howbeir hencuer wondred more at his good fortune, then ing. thatday he did. For, sylla faid he, defired to faue the city of ATHENS, the gods granted him that fauour that he might do it; but I that would faine follow him therein, and faue this city, fortune thwarting my defire, bath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that caused Corinth to be burnt. Neuertheleffe he did his best indeuour at that time to helpe the poore city againe. For touching the fire, cuen immediatly after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus selfe before he left the city made agreatnumber of the houses which were spoyled by fire, to be built vp againe, and court cously received all the inhabitants that were fled, befides them he placed other GRECIANS there alfo, that were willing to dwell amongst them, and increased the bounds and confines of the city which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlongs in the countrey. This city was acolonic of the Athenians, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire flourished, and that they ruled the seas: by reason whereof, many slying the tyrannie of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the same. This good hap fell vpon them, that for faking their owne goods, they went to possessife and enjoy the goods of other men: but the very citizens of Athens it selfe that had escaped from this great defolation, Lucultus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas apeece, Tyrannien and sent them againe into their countrey. Tyrannion the Grammarian was taken at that time, the gramwhom Murana begged of Lucullus: and Lucullus having granted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he dealt very discourteously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in bestowing this prisoner upon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Murana should take him for a bondman, whereby he should need afterwards to make him free. For feeming to make him free, and restore him to liberty, was no more then to take that freedome and libertie from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in that onely, Murana laid himselfe open to the world, that he had not all the parts a worthy Captaine should have in him. When Lucullus departed from Am 1 sv s, he went to visite LVCVLLVS. the cities of Asia, to the end that whilest he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue fome refreshing of lawes and instice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long time in As 14, the poore country was so afflicted and oppressed with so many euils and miseries: as no man liuing would feant believe, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible couetousnesse of the farmers, customers, and Romaine vsurers, did not only denoure it, but also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to fell their goodly yong fonnes and daughters in mariage, to pay the interest and vsurie of the money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall and publikely the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the statues of their gods, and other church iewels: and yet in the end, they themselues were also to beindged bondmen and slaues to their cruell creditors, to weare out their bodies in miserable seruitude. And yet the worst of all was, the paine they put them to before they were fo condemned for they imprisoned them, fet them on the racke, tormented them ypon a little brasen horse, set them in the stockes, made them stand naked in the greatest heate of sommer, and on the ice in the deepest of winter, so as that bondage seemed vnto them a reliefe of their miseries, and a rest of their torments. Lucullus found the cities of Asia full of fuch oppressions, but in a short time after he deliuered them all that were wrongfully tormented. For first he tooke order, they should account for the vsurie that was payed monethly, the hundred part of the principall debt onely, and no more. Secondly, he cut off all viuries that ter the rate passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor and vourer should enjoy the fourth part of the profits and reuenues of his debter. And hethat ioyned vsurie with the principall, that is to say, tooke vsurie vpon vsury, should lose the whole. So that by this order, all debts were payed in leffe then foure yeares, and the owners lands and reuenues fet cleare of all maner payments. This furcharge of viuries, came of the twenty thou. fand talents, wherein Sylla had condemned the country of Asia: the which fummethey had payed twife before vnto the farmers and collectors of the Romains, who had raifed it, still heaping vsurie vpoh vsurie to the summe of fixscore thousand talants. Wherefore these collectors and farmers ratine to Rome, and cryed out vpon Lucullus, faying, that he did them the greatest wrong that could be: & by meanes of mony, they procured certaine of the comon counsellors to speake against him: which they might easily do, because they had divers of their names in their books that dealt in the affaires of the comonwealth of Rome. But Lucullus was not only beloued of those countries whom he did good vnto, but was wished for and desired also of others, who thought the countries happie that might have such a governour. Now for Appius Clodius, whom Lucullus had sent before from TALAVRA unto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, & whose fister atthat time was Lucullus wife: he first tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high courty, making him fetch a great compasse about, by many dates iourneys spent in vaine: vntill such time as one of his infranchized bondmen that was bornein Syria, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these barbarous guides, and leauing the wrong wayes they had led him, within few dayes past ouer the river of Euphrates, and arrived in the city of Antioch, furnamed EPIDAPHNE. Where he had commandement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the country of PHOENICIA, where he subdued certaine cities, and had some other yet to conquer. Appius in the meane time wan secretly divers of the princes & noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, & against their wils, amongst whom was Zarbienus, king of the prouince of Gordi ENA: and promised the aide of Lucullus also to many of the cities that sent vnto him (which had not long before bene fubdued and brought into bondage) to whom neuertheleffe he gaue in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once stirre, nor alter any thing. For the rule of these ARMENIANS WAS intollerable to the GRECIANS, and specially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Who, by reason of his great prosperity, was growne to such pride and presumption, that what soeuer men did commonly esteeme best, and make most reckoning of, he would not onely haue it, and wheit as his owne, but also tookeit that all was made for himselse whatsoeuer; and this great ourweening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and fauour towards him. For at the beginning he had but veric little, and yet with this little (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations, and plucked downethe power of the Persians as much as any man that ever was before him. He replenished the countrey of MESOPOTAMIA with GRECIAN inhabitants, which he brought by force out of CILICIA and CAPPADOGIA, compelling them to inhabite there. He made the ARRABIAN's change their maner of living, who are otherwife called the Schniths, as much to fay, as tent dwellers, because they are vagrant people that dwell inno other houses but tents, which they euer vie to carrie with them, and brought them our of their naturall countrey, and made them follow him, vfing them for his commoditie in trade of merchandize. There were ever many kings in his court that waited on him: but amonest others, he had foure kings that waited continually on his person as his footemen: for when he rode abroade any whither, they ranne by his stirrop in their shirts. And when he was fet in his chaire of stare to give audience, they stood ontheir feete about his chaire holding their hands together, which countenance shewed the most manifest confession and tokens of bondage that they could doe vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all The bold. their liberty, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and master, more ready to suffer, then pine clediany thing to do. Notwithstanding, Appins Clodius being nothing abashed nor feared with all ... Luculus this tragicall pompe, when audience was given him, told king Tigranes boldly to his face, down onto that he was come to carry king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumph of Ly. Tigranes. cullus; and therefore did fummon him to deliuer that king into his hands, or else that he proclaimed warres vpon himselfe. They that were present at this summons, knew well inough that Tigranes (although he fet a good countenance on the matter openly with a faint counterfeir laughing) yet hearing these words so boldly and gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hit at the heart. For Tigranes having reigned (or to fav better, tyrannically gouerned) fine and twentie yeares space, had neuer heard any bold or franke speech but that. Notwithstanding, he answered Appins, that he would not deliver Milhridates, and if the Romaines made warres with him, that he would defend himselfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gave him not the title, King of kings, but onely king simply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as youch safe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leave, he fent him goodly rich presents, which he refused. Whereupon the king sent others againe vnto him, of the which Appins ab. tooke a cup onely, because the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: from ta and so sending all the rest againe vnto him, madegreat haste to returne to his Captaine Lucul, king of gifts lus. Now Tigranes before that time would not once fee king Mithridates his fo neare kinfeman, who by fortune of warres had lost so puissant and great a kingdome, but proudly kept him vnder, in fennie, marish and vnwholesome grounds, without any honour given vnto him, as if he had bene a very prisoner indeed: how beit then he sent for him honourably, and received him with great courtefic. When they were neare together in the kings pallace, they talked fe- Tigranet cretly one with another, and excusing themselues, clearing all suspitions conceived betweene and Mithem, to the great hurt of their feruants and friends, whom they burthened with all the occasion meeting. of vnkindnesse betweene them: amongst which number Metrodorus the Schrsian was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speech, and one whom Mithridates so much loued and Matroda. esteemed, that they called him the kings father. Mithridates at the beginning of his wars had sent him Ambassadour vnto Tigranes, to pray aide of him against the Romaines. At which time Tigranes said vnto him; but what sayest thouto it Metrodorus; what advice wilt thou give me? Metrodorus either because he had regard vnto Tigranes profite, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe: As Ambassadour, ô King, I would wish you should do it: but as a Counsellour, that you should not doe it. Tigranes now reported this speech vnto Mishridates, not thinking he would have hurt Metrodorus for it, though indeed he presently put him to death vpon it. Whe hat Tigranes was heartily sorie, and repented him greatly to hauctold him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, hauing but onely reviued Mithridates evill will before conceined against him: for he had bornehim displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honourably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead bothers, then died dy of him, whom living he had betrayed. There died in King Tigranes Court also an Orator in King called Amphicrates, if he descrue that mention should be made of him, for the city of ATHENS court. fake wherin he was borne; for it is faid, that when he was banished out of his country, he fled into the city of Selevila, which standeth vpon the river of Tigris. When the inhabitants of the ding you fame praied him to teach them the Art of Eloquence in their country, he wold not youch fafe it, Tigris f.

Arlatter but answered them proudly: that a platter was too little to hold a Dolphine in, meaning that too little to hold a Dol. their city was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected and accused: so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieued him fo much that he famished himselfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honourably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, neare vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that countrey. Now when Lucallus had quieted all things in Asia, and had established good lawes among them, he was not carelesse also of games and pleasant pastimes, but while he was at leisure in the city of Ephesvs, he made many games, feasts, wrestlings, and sence-playes at the sharpe for ioy of his victory, delighting all the cities of Asia with them; the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemne feast also in the honour of him, which they called Lu. cullea, and did celebrate it with great ioy, shewing a true and no fained friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honour they could deuise to give him. But after that Appins Clodius was returned from his Ambassade, and had told Lucullus that he must make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went back againe vnto the realme of Pontvs, where he tooke his army which he had left in garrifon and brought it before the city of Sinope to lay frege vnto it, or rather to befrege certaine Cili-CIAN'S that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they faw Lucullus come against them, they slue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the city, fled their way by night, Lucullus being aduertifed of it, entred the city, put eight thousand of the City. CIANS to the fword which he found there, and restored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the originall cause that made him to be carefull to preserve the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nights dreamethat one came to him, and faid; goe a litle farther Lucullus, for Antolyeus commeth, who is defirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision meant. It was the felf sameday on the which he tooke the citie of SINOPE, where following the CILICIANS that escaped by flying, he found an imagelying on the ground vpon the fea fide, which the CILICIANS would haue carried away; but they were taken and followed fo neare, that they had no leifure to ship it. This statue (as it is reported) was one of the good liest and notablest workes of Sthenis the image grauer. And some say it was the image of Antolycus, who sounded the city of SINOPE. For Autolycus was one of the princes that went out of THESSALIE with Hercules to go against the AMAZONES, and he was the sonne of Deimachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the ship in the which Autolycus was imbarked, with Demoleon and Phlogius, made shipwracke vpon arocke of the coast of CHERRONESVS, where she was cast away: howbeitthat he and his men scaping with all their furniture, came to the city of SINOPE, which he took from certaine Syrians, who came (as they fay) of one Syrus the fonne of Apollo, and of the nymph Sinope Asopus daughter. Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a faving of Sylla to minde. which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may give more credite vnto, then that which is fignified to vs by dreames. In the meane scason he was aduertised that Tigranes and Mithridates were ready to come downe into Lycaonia and Ci-LICIA, because they might first enter As IA. Lucullus maruelled much at Tigranes counsell, that fithence he was minded to war with the Romaine s, he did not vse Mithridates aid in his wars at fuch time, as when he was in his best strength & force: and that he did not then io yne his power with Mithridates, rather then fuffer him to be destroyed and overthrowne, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding himselfe with those that could not helpe themselues. While these things passed in this fort, Machares king Mithridates sonne, that kept the realme of Bosphory s, fent a crowne of gold vnto Lucullus, of the weight of athousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a friend and confederate of the Romaines. Whercupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last end of his first warre, and leaving Sornatius with fixe thousand mento keepe the realme of Pontys, he departed with twelve thousand footmen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen, to goe to the second warre. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a part of him, to goe with so small a company to fight with so many warlike nations, and to put himselfe vnto the hazard of so many thousands of horsemen, in a maruellous large countrey, and of a wonderful length, enuironed round about with deepe rivers and mountaines, covered with snow all

And on the other fide, the common counsellors at Rome cryed out on him continually, and openly protested before all the people, that out of one warre he sowed another, which the commonwealth had nothing to do withall; and that he looked after none other thing but still to raise new prosperity. occassions of warres, to the end he might alwaies haue armies at his commandement, and neuer leaue the wars, because he would make himselfe great with the cost and perill of the commonwealth. These crying counsellers in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus for all that, marched on with his army with all the possible speed he could, so that he came in few daies vnto the river of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough, by reason of the winter season: which trou. bled him maruellously at that present, doubting left it would hold him there a long time in finding out of boats, and making of posts and plancks to build a bridge to passe ouer his armic. But 17 high and towards night the water beganto fall a little, and in the night fell fo much, that the next morning the river was come to her ordinarie streame; and moreover the country men themselves discerand fudning certaine little Ilands that appeared vnto them in the middest of the water course, and the riuer very calme as a marish round about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing establish they had never seene chance before, as though a his comming the singre had siddenly wealth. they had neuer feene chance before: as though at his comming the river had suddenly yeelded testion her vnto him, and was become gentle to giue him safe and easie passage. And because he would not great spellosethat oportunity, he passed ouer his army immediatly: and was no sooner on the other side, but he met with a happie token of good lucke, which was this. On the other fide of the river, therewas a certaine number of kine confecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous people Diana Persi inhabiting beyond the river of Euphrates, do reverence and honour about all the other gods: fea. and these kine they employ to none other vse, but onely to sacrifice them vnto this goddesse. Kine confe-They wander all about the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will, without any manner of tying, or shackling crated to the country where they will be a constant. otherwise, having onely the marke of the goddesse, which is, a lampe printed vpon their bodies, sea. and they are not casse to be taken when one would hauethem, but with great ado. One of these consecrated kine, after that Lucullus army was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe v- Asrange pona rocke which they suppose is hallowed or dedicated vnto this goddesse, bowing down her thing of a contrast head, and firetching out her neck, like those that are tyed short, as if she had come even of purposeto present her selfe to Lucullus, to be facrificed as she was. And besides her, he facrificed a fir her selfe bull also vnto the river of Euphrates, intoken of thanks for his safe passage over. Lucullus the first to be fairst. day did nothing but incampe himselfe only, on the other side of the river; but the next morning fieed. Ethe other daies following, he went farther into the country by the river of Sophene, hurting The country none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly received his armie. For when his men of Sephone. would have had him to have taken a castle by force, wherethey said was great store of gold and filier, he shewed them mount Taurus afarre off, and told them, it is that which he must rather go to take: as for the things which be in this castle, they be kept for them that vanquish. And going on still with great iourneys, passed ouer the river of Tigris, and so entred the realme of $A_{\rm R}$ - Tigris s. MENIA with a maine army. Now for Tigranes, the first manthat ventured to bring him newes of Tigranes Treatles coming had no in first the arms the boat for his laboration of the street first the Lucullus coming, had no toy of it: for he cut off his head for his labor. And therfore from thence-mifferger forth there durft no man fay any thing vnto him, vntill fuch time as he was at the last enuironed that round with fire, weh Luculius army had raifed about him, before he could heare any thing therof. For he was sporting & gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus of Lucullus indeed were a noble captaine, if he durst but tarry Tigranes coming downe in the city of EP HE- approach, svs onely, and how he would ftraight flie out of As 1A, so soone as he might but hearetell of his coming against him, with so triumphing an army, of so many thousand men. And thus may we fee, that like as al bodies and braines, are not alike strong nor able to carrie much wine: so in like case, all wits be not resolute & constant, neuer to do amisse, nor to swarue from reasons bounds in great prosperity. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the truth: whose boldnesse had little better reward for his newes then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediatly with three thousand horse, fendeth and a good number of footmen, commanding him that he should bring Lucullus aliue vnto him, Miltroand that furthermore, he should march vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus already barzans camped with part of his armie, and the other part comming after, when his skoutes brought gainst him newes of the barbarous Captaines approach: which at the first put him in seare, that if the enemie should come and affaile them thus scattered in companies, and not ranged in battel and readie to fight, he might ouerthrow them while they were in diforder. And therefore he remained within his campeto fortifie the same, and sent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with athoufand fixe hundred horse, and as many footmen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commanding him to approach as neare to his enemie as he could without fighting, onely to flav him there, vntill such time as he heard newes that al his armie was come together into his camp, Sextilius went to doc his commandement, but he was compelled to fight, (though against his will) Mithrobarzanes came so brauely and lustily to assaile him. So was the battell striken be. tweene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was flaine valiantly fighting, and all his men either broken or killed, few excepted, that onely by flying faued themselues. After this ouerthrow Tigranes for sooke his great royall city of Tigranocerra that he built himselfe, and went to mount Taurus, where he assembled a great number of men out of all parts. But Lucullus would giue him no leisure to prepare himselfe, but sent Murena on the one side to cut them off by the way, and to ouerthrow those that were affembled about him: and on the other side Sextilius to by Vigranss flop agreat company of the Arabians that were coming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius fetypon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in manner enery man. And Murana following king Tigranes at the heeles, spied an occasion to give the charge as he passed along a narrow valley, in the bottome whereof the way was very ill, and specially for an army of such a length: and taking the opportunity, set vpon the rereward, which Tigranes perceiuing, sed straight vpon it, making all his cariage to be throwne downe in the way before the enemies to flay them. There were a great number of the Armenians flaine in this ouerthrow, and motaken. Those things having this successe, Lucullus went to the city of TIGRANOCERTA, the which he befieged round. In that city were a maruellous number of GRECIANS that had bin brought thither by force out of CILICIA, and many of the barbarous people also whom they had vied in the like forcible manner, as they had done the Adiabenians, the Assyrians, the Gor-DIÆNIANS, and the Cappadocians, whose townes and cities Tigranes had destroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reason whereof, this city of TIGRANOCERTA was full of gold and filuer, of mettals, statues, tables and pictures, because euery man(as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) studied to please the king, to enrich and beautisse this city, with all kinds of furniture and ornaments fit for the same. And hereupon Lucullus straighted the siegess much as he could, perswading himselfethat Tigranes would neuer suffer that it should be taken, but(though he had otherwise determined)yet for very anger would present him battell, therby to enforce him to raise his siege. And surely he gessed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had diffwaded him by expresse letters and messengers that he should inno case hazard battell, and perswaded him rather to cut off the victuals on alsides from the Romains with his horsemen. The felfe same counsell and aduice did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates sent) give him in his campe, and prayed him very earnefly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the Romaines . Tigranes patiently hearkened to their reasons at the first; but when the Ar-MENIANS Werecome, and all the force of the countrey beside, and the GORDIÆNIANS, and that the kings of the MEDEs and of the ADIABENIANS were come also with all their power, and that on the other side there came a maruellous great host of the ARABIANS that dwell upon the sea of Babylon, and a multitude of the Albanians from the Caspian sea, and of the IDERIANS their neighbours, befides agreat company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the river of Araxes, some coming freely to do him pleasure, other for their pensions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table, nor incouncell, but of affured hope of victory, and of great brags and barbarous threatnings, fo that Taxi les was in great danger of himselse, because he was against the determination taken in councel for giving of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates didenuie the glorie of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus diffwade him from battell. For which respect Tigranes would not fomuch as tarrie for him, and because also Mithridates should have no part of the honour of his victory but went into the field with all his great army, vanting amongst his familiars as they report, that nothing grieued him but one, that he should fight with Lucallus alone, and not with all other Romaine Captaines. Now this brauerie was not so fond, nor so farre out of square, but that there was great likelihood of it when he saw so many fundry nations about him, so many kings that followed him, fo many battels of armed footemen, and fo many thousands of horsemen. For he had in his armie of bow-men and slings onely, twenty thousand: fiue and fif- Tigranes tv thousand horsemen, whereof senenteene thousand men of armes, armed from top to toe, as whole are Lucallus himselfe wrote vnto the Senate; and an hundred & fifty thousand armed footmen, deuidedby enfignes and squadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, masons, and such other kind of handi-threscere crafts men, to plaine waies, to make bridges to passe ouer rivers, to stop streames, to cut wood and to make fuch kind of workes; of this fort of people, the number of flue and thirty thousand, who followed in battel ray in the rereward of the army, making their campe feeme far greater, and by so much the more stronger. When Tigranes shewed on the top of mount Taurus, and that they might plainely see his whole army from the city, and that himselfealso might easily discerne Lucullus armie that besieged TIGRANOCERTA: the barbarous people that were within the city were so glad of this fight, that they made wonderfull shouts of ioy, and great clapping ofhands, threatning the ROMAINEs from their wals, and shewing them the army of the Ar-MENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time fate in councell to confider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his siege, and go with his whole army vindenided Lucalland against Tigranes. But others liked not that he should leave so great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he should raise his siege.. Lucullus made them answer, that neither of them graves. both did counsell him well, but both together did counsell right. Whereupon he deuided his army, and left Murana at the fiege of TIGRANOCERTA with fixe thousand men: and he with foureand twenty cohorts (in the which were not about ten thousand armed footmen) and all his horsemen, with a thousand bowmen and slings, or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad field by the rivers side. The ROMAINES seemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, so that for a while Tigranes parasites made but a May-game of them to sport withall. For fome laughed them to scorne, other drew lots, and played away their part of the spoyles, as if they had already wonne the field: and enery-one of the kings and Captaines came and offered themselues to Tigranes, and besought him every man for himselse, that he would giue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would please him to sit by in some place to feethe foort. Tigranes then, because he would shew that he could be as pleasant as the rest, fpake a thing knowne to enery man: If they come as Ambaffadors (quoth he) they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but few. And thus they played vponthe Romaines, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the field, and put them in order of battel. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on the other fide of the river toward the East, and by chance the streame of the river turned fodainly towards the West, where there was abetter foord to passe ouer. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his army by the rivers fide, following the streame to meete with some foord, casting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, & called for Taxile, and faid vnto him, laughing: Doest thou see Taxiles those goodly Romaine legions, whom thou praisest to be men fo inuincible, how they flie away now? Taxiles answered the king again: I would your good fortune (O king) might worke some miracle this day; for doubtleffe it were a strange thing that the ROMAINES should flie. They are not wont to weare their braue coates and furniture vpontheir armour, when they meane onely but to march in the fields: neither do they carrie their shields and targets vncased, nor their burganets bare on their heads, as they doe at this present, having throwne away their leather cases and coverings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we see so bright & glistring in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they march towards vs. Taxiles had no sooner spokenthese words, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his enfigne-bearer turne sodainely that caried the first Eagle, and the bands tooke their places to passe the river in order of battel. Then Tigranes, secretly come to himselse, as out of drunkennesse, cryed out aloud twife or thrise, come they then to vs. But then was there no small stirre and tumult; to put such a world of people in battell. The king Tigranes himselfevodertook to leade the middle battel, gaue the left wing voto the king of the ADIAB E-NIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the most part of the compleate armed men, who made the first front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to passe \$ . riucr, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wish him to take heede that he fought not that day, because it was one of those which the ROMAINES thought vnfortunate, or resource. and call them Atri, as to fay, blacke: for vpon one of those dayes, one Cepio was ouerthrown in a maio dates, butrather more, ought noblemens words to be weyed, and their countenances marked, as well in aduersitie as in prosperitie. At that time by chance there was a common feast day in the chie of Sparta, which was full of strangers that came to see the daunces and sports of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arrived that brought the newes of the battell loft at LEVCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor straight ran all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had loft the figniorie and commaundement ouer all GRECE. flacen would not fuffer them for all this to breake off their daunce in the Theater, nor the citie in any thing to change the forme of their feast; but fent vnto the parents (to every mans house) to let them vnderstand the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they themselues remaining still in the Theater to see the daunces and sports continued, to judge who earied the best games away. The next morning when every man knew the number of them that were flaine, and of those also that were escaped, the parents and friends of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking chearefully of the matter, and one of them embraced another. On theother fide, the parents of them that escaped, kept their houses with their wives, as solkethat mourned. If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houses for any matter of necessitie, ye should see him looke so heavily and fad, that he durst not talke with you, liftup his head, nor looke ye in the face. Befides all this, euen among ft the women there was greater difference: for the mothers of them that were to returne from the battell, were fad and forrowfull, and spake not a word : contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went friendly to visite one another, to rejoyce together. Now when the people faw that their confederates began to forsake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victorie, would inuade Peroponnesses, then they began to be pricked in conscience about the Oracles of the gods, thinking that this misfortune came to their city for that they had thrust out of the kingdomea man perfect of limmes, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the godsto beware of that about all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valiantnesse, and his authoritie was such thereby, that they did not onely vsehim in warre as their king and soueraigne Captaine, but in civill causes also, wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduice: as they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at Sparta Trefantas (being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houses, and of greatest power within the citie) left they should moue some stir or commotion among them. (For by law, they can beare no office in the common wealth: it is shame and reproch to give them any wives, and alfoto marry any of theirs: who socuer meeteth them, may lawfully strike them, and they must abide it, and not give them a word againe: they are compelled to weare poore tottered cloth gownes, patched with cloth of divers colours; and worst of all, to shaue one side of their beards, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the danger great to deale with them, to execute the law according to the infamie they deserved, specially then standing in need of agreat num ber of men of warre, they referred themselues altogether vnto Agesilaus, to take such order in it as he thought good: but Agestlans then, without changing or altering any thing of the law, faid in open affembly at LACED AMON, that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policie he kept the law inuiolate, and faued also the honor of those poore men and withall to put these youths againe in heart, being amazed with this feare, he led the armic into the countrey of ARCADIA, and would gineno battell, but only tooke a small citie of the MANTINEANS, and for aged the country. This agains did a litle reviue the city of Sparta with fome hope, to make that it should not vtterly despaire But shortly after, Epaminondas invaded the country of LACONIA with fourty thousand foomen welarmed, besides an infinite number of other light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoile: so that in all, there were about threescore and ten thousand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was welneare fixehundred yeares fith the Don't ANS possessed LACED &MON, and in all that time till then they neuer faw enemies in their comtry that durft inuade them: but then they facked and burnt all that came in their way, even will the river of Eurotas, and hard adjoyning vnto Sparta, & no man durst come out to result them, For Agefilaus (as Theopompus writeth) would not fuffer the LACED EMONIANS to gocourte fight against such a tempest and surie of warre, but having fortified the middest of the citie, and guarded enery end of the streetes with souldiers, he patiently bare all the bragges and threats ofthe THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bade him come into the field to defend his countrey, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, having himselfe procuredthis warre. If this went to Agefilans heart, no leffe grieuous were those troubles to him that rose within the city: as the cries and running to and fro of the old men, which were mad to feethat they did before their eyes: and of filly women also, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe as straught of their wits, to hearethe noise the enemies made, and to fee the fire which they raifed all the fields ouer. Much more forowfull alfo did this make him, when as he bethought himselfe, that entring into his kingdome at such time as the citie of Sparta was in greatest prosperitie that euerit was, he now saw his honour eclipsed, and the glory of his kingdome ouerthrowne: and the rather, for that himselfe had often vaunted, that LACONIAN women had never feen the smoake of any enemies camp. And as they say of Antalcides one day, that he answered an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valiantnesse certains of one anothers nation, alleadging for himselfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driven the La-witty an CEDEMONIANS from the river of Cephifus: It is true, faid the LACONIAN; but we did never fiver. driveyou from the river of Eurotas. The like answer made a meane man of Sparta, to one of the Argives that cast him in the teeth, There are divers of your LACONIANS buried in the country of Argolide: So are there none of yours, faid he, buried in LACONIA. It is reporred, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephors at that time, did fecretly fend his children into the le of CITHERA, fearing lest the city of SPARTA should be taken, I gestlaus perceiuing that the enemies forced to passe ouer the river to enter the citie, he stood to defend the middle part of the citic being the highest place of the same, and there had his menset in order of battell. Now at thattime, by chance the river of Eurotas was swelled greater then of ordinarie, by reason of the fnow waters that fell abundantly, which troubled more the Thebans with the coldnesse, then roughnesse of the same in passing it ouer. Some shewing Agestaus how Epaimnondas marched formoit before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer off him, faying neurraword but this onely: Oh, what a noble fellow is that ? Epaminondas having done all that he could possible to give the LACED EMONIANS battell, even within the citie selfe of Sparta. that he might there have fet up some tokens of triumph, he could never entice Agesilaus to come out of his fort: wherefore he was driven in the end to depart thence, and fo went to deftroy all therest of the country. There fell out a conspiracie of two hundred men in Sparta, who of mon under long time had had an ill meaning with them, and took that quarter of the citie where the temple described. of Diana flood, called Isforium, aplace of strong situation, and ill to distresse. Hereupon the the temper LACED EMONIANS in fury would straight haue set vpon them. But Agestlans fearing great mu- of Diana. tinicand stirre vpon it, commanded that no man should stirre; and himselfe vnarmed, in a poore of the degowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that strength: Sirs, ye have not obeyed prehend the my commandement, this is not the place I appointed you to affemble in, neither all of you trainers. inone place, for I willed you to disperse your selves, some one way, some another way, shewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing these words, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not bewraied: and fo leaving that firength, went into those parts of the citic that he had shewed them. Agefilaus then bringing others thither, possessed the fort of Issorium, and tooke fifteene of those conspirators, and put them to death the next night following. Howbeit then there brake out another conspiracie farre greater then the first, of the Spar-TANS themselves, which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sudden stirre andgarboile; and to punish them in so great atrouble, it was hard: on the other side to neglect it, the conspiracie was ouer-dangerous. Agestlans having consulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any judgement of law: where never Spartan before them fuffered death, without due order of law. Againe, whereas diuerse of their neighbours, and of the I-LOTES themselves (whom they had billed in their bands of souldiers) stole away and ranne to their enemies, which did much discourage them that remained: he warned his men that they ture of the should enery day go to their couches where they lay, and that they should take away their ar- Thebanous mourthat were fled, and hide it, because they should not know the number of them that were of Latvoid. fled in this fort. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, fome fay that they went out of LA-CONTA by reason of the winter that came on, whereupon the ARCADIANS discharged their bands, and enery one departed his way in diforder. Theopompus writeth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBAN'S hauing determined to depart, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, fent from Agefilaus, who brought them tentalents that they should depart out of their countrey. Thus had they money giuen them to defray their charges homewards, to do that, which they themselues had long before determined to have done. And yet do I wonder, how it is possible that all other history riographers knew nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All do acknow. ledge truly, that Ageflaus onely was the caufe that the city of Sparta was faued : who leauing his ambition and felfe will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safety. Neuerthelesse, after this great ouerthrow, he could neuer raise Sparta againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole bodie, which having acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least diforder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: enense Licurgus having framed a perfect state of government in the common wealth of Sparra, to make her citizens line in peace and amitie together; when they did enlarge it by great kingdomes and realmes, the which the good law-maker thought vnmeete to continue happielife. they were straight ouerthrowne, and all went to wracke. By this time Agefilaus was growne old, and could no more go to the warres for very age; but his forme Archidamus, with the aide The leave-left bartell Which Dianysius the tyrant of Syrac vs a fent vnto them, wanne a battell against the Arcaof Archida DIANS, Colled the Tearlesse battell; for there died not one of his men, and they slue agreat number of their enemies. This victorie plaintly shewed the great weaknesse and decay of the city of Sparta. For in former times it was fo common a thing vnto them to ouercome their enemies in battell, that they did facrifice nothing elle to the gods in token of thankes, within the citic, but a poore cocke : and they that had fought the battell, made no boast of it, neither did they that heard the newes greatly rejoyee atit. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of Mantinea, which Thucydides describeth, the Ephorionely sent the messenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdered meare, and no other thing. Butthen when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they understood Archidamus camehome victorious, neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father himfelfe went first of allto meete him, with theteares in his eyes for ioy, and after him all the other magistrates and officers of the citie; and a swarme of old folke both men and women came downe to the rivers fide, holding vp their hands to heaven, and thanking the gods, as if their citie had redeemed and recouered her shame and lost honour, and began now to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, fome fay that the husbands durft not boldly looke their wives in the faces they were so ashamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the citic of MESSINAheing by Epaminondas reedified and replenished with people, he called home againe out of all parts, the natural inhabitants of the fame. The Spartans durft not fight with him (nor to himder his purpose) though it spited them to the hearts, and were angry with Agesilaus, forthatin his reigne they had loft al that territory, which was as great as all LACONTA felfe, and for goodnesseand fertilitie to be compared with the best parts of all GRECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agesilan would not agree to the peace which the THEBANS fent to offer him; and all because he would not relinquish that in words, which the enemies kept in deeds. Therfore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not onely without recouring the thing he looked for, but had in manneralfolds the city of Sparta by a warlike stratageme, in the which he was decided. For the Mantine-ANS being newly revolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and having sent for the LA-CEDEMONIANS, Epaminondas receiving intelligence that Agefilaus was departed from Sparta with all his power to aide the MANTINEANS, marched away secretly by night from TEGEA, without the privite of the Mantineans, and went straight to Sparta the which he hadalmost surprised on the sudden, going another way then Agestiaus came (being in maner without men to defend it.) Howbeita THESPIAN called Euthynus, as Callifthenes faith, (or as Xenophon writeth, a CRETAN) brought Agesilam newes of it; who dispatched a horseman straight to aducrtife them of the citie of SPARTA, and marching forward himselfe to returne, stayed not long after before he arrived. He was no sooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who passing ouer the river of Euroras, gaucassault to the citie. Then Agesilam perceiuing that there was no more place nor time of fecuritie as before, but rather of desperation and courage, heevaliantly defended it, more then an olde mans yeares could beare.

Thus, through courage and desperate mind, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did cuervieit, he put by the danger and faued the city of Sparta from Epaminondas hands, ferting vp markes of triumph for repulfing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to fee the LACED EMONIANS how honourably they rewarded their nurse and coun-The fortitrey for their good education, but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that tade of the day running into enery part of the city, with a few about him, to repulle the enemies wherefocuer the danger was greatest. It is faid also, that at that time there was one Hadas the sonne of Phabidas, that did maruellous strange things to behold, both in the face of his enemics, as alfoin the fight of his friends. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his The radiate. wouth: and being starke naked, and vnarmed, his bodie nointed with oyle, having in one hand negle of aborestaffe, and in the other a fword, in this manner he went out of his house, and ranne a- Isalus a monest them that fought, killing and ouerthrowing his enemies that withstood him, and was spartan. not once hurt, either for that the gods prescrued him for his manhoods sake, or else because menthought him more then a man. The Ephore immediatly gaue him a crowne, in honour and Isadas rereward of his valiantnesses but with all they set a fine on his head to pay a thousand filter Drach-warded and maes for his rash attempt, to hazard himselfe in battell, vnarmed for defence. Shortly after they fought another great battell before the citie of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas having overthrownethe first rankes of the LACED EMONIANS, and couragiously distressing the rest, valiantly following the chase, there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiting him (as The death Diofeorides writeth) flue him with his borespeare. The LACED EMONIANS to this day notwith- uf Epamiflanding, do call the offpring of this Anticrates, Machariones, as much to fay, as fivord-men, as nondes. though he had flaine him with a fword. The LACED AMONIANS did effectmethis Anticrates fo much, for that deadly stroke he gaue (because they were afraid of Epaminondas while he lived) fo called. that they gaue him that flue him, great honours and dignities, and discharged all his ofspring and kindred from paiment offubfidy and common contributions, which priviledge one Callicrates, akinsman of this Anticrates enjoyed even in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminonda, the GRECIANS having taken peace generally among st them, Agesilaus would needs exclude the Messenians from being fworne to this peace, faying: that they need not sweare, because they had no city. Now, for a fmuch as all the GRECIAN's else did receive them as amongst the number, and tooke their oath vnto this peace, the LACED & MONIAN'S brake off from this generall peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS country. and all through the allurement of Agesslaus, who for this cause was thought of the GRECIANS a cruelland unfatiable man for warres, to deale so craftily, and all to breake this generall league. Againe, he brought himselfe in discredite with all men, being compelled to make his city bare of great of money, borrowing of them still, and raising fundry contributions amongst them: whereas in- warres. deed it had been his best way to have ended all these miseries, having so happy an occasion offered at that time, and not to have lost so great an Empire of so many townes and cities both by fea and land, and all to plague his countrey, to winne the land and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue himself vnto one Taches, a Captaine of the ÆGYPTIANS, euery man thinking it a shameful part of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefest man of al the GRECIANS, & the which had filled the world with report of his fame and glory) should for money let out his person to hire, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traytour and rebell to his king and master, to become a mercenary Captaine and fouldier to do him feruice. And moreouer, he being now fourescore yeares of age and vpwards, his bodie all mangled with wounds, though he had vndertaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRECIANS, yet had his ambition deserved some blame: for noble acts have their time, yea rather the good and ill do nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocritie. But Agesilaus had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in seruice, specially for benefit of the commonwealth, but perswaded himfelfethatit was a dishonour to him to line idlie in a city and do nothing, till death should come andmake his summons thereupon therefore he leavied men of warre through all GRECE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea, having thirtie SPARTAN & Counfellors and affistants to him, as he had in his first iourney. Now Agessiaus being argined in A-GYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and gouernours of king Tachos came to the fea flore, and honourably received him: and not they onely, but infinit numbers of AGYPTIAN s of all forts Hhh 2 firength. Agefilans being offended that he mistrusted him thus, tooke it inwardly; but being a-hamed to turne againe voto the third, and also to depart without any exploit done, he followed him, and enclosed himselfe within those walles. The enemies pursuing him hard, came ynto the city, and began to intrench it round, to keepe him in. Then the Acrerian Nectances fearing a long fiege, determined to give them battell. Thereto the hired Grecians, gave confent, as defiring no better match, & the rather also for that there was but small store of corne within the city. But Agefilaus perswading the contrary, would in no wife consent to it; whereupon the Egyp-TIANS thought worse of him then before and plainly called him traitor to their king. Howbeit he did patiently beare all these accusations, expecting time to performe an exploit he intended, which was this. The enemies had cast a deepe trench without to compasse them in. When this trench drew neare to end, and that both ends lacked not much of meeting, tarrying till night came on, he commanded the Grecians to arme and to put themselves in readingsee; then he came unto the Egyptian, and faid unto him: Lo here is an excellent occasion prefented to faue quen in the midst of it, he sudainely stopped their passage with the front of his battell, which he cast to the breadth of the fluce, and thus made his number of fighting men equal with the multitude of his enemies, which could neuer compaffe him in behind, nor flanke him on the fides.

(that were maruellous desirous of him, for the great same that went abroad of Agestlans) came thither from all parts to fee what manner of man he was. But when they faw no stately trainesbout him, but an old gray beard layed on the graffe by the sea side, a litle man that looked simply of the matter, & but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored threed-bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembring the merry tale, that a mountaine should bring foorth, and was delinered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saw men bring him presents to wel. come him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geefe, and fuch groffe things: and refused all confections, perfumes, and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to giue them to the ILOTES his flaues. Theophraftus writeth, that he delighted maruelloufly in the rush Papyrus, and liked the garlands they made of them, for their fitnesse & the handsomenesse, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing spoken at that time with Tachus, who was affembling his army to go on his iourney, he was not made Captaine generall, as he locked he should have beene, but was appointed onely Colonell of all the strangers. Chabrias Generall of all the army by fea, and the chiefe of all the reft was Tachos himfelfe inperfon. This at the first grieved Agesilans to the heart, being driven whether he wold or not, to beare with the vanity and pride of this EGYPTIAN. So he failed with them into PHENICE, againft the PHENICIANS, imbasing himselfe against his noble disposition and mind, and gauchimplace vntill he saw time of reuenge. It chanced that one Nietanebos a nephew of this Tachos, having the leading of part of this army, rebelled against him, and being chose king by the Egyptians, he fent vnto Ag. filage, and prayed him to come and take his part. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, & prayed him to loyue with him, promiting great rewards vnto them both. Tachus underfranding that, befought them both that they would not for fake him. Chabrias for his partallo did likewise intreate Agesilaus, & perswaded him what he could, to continue friendship with Tachos. Agefilans answered him: For thee, Chabrias, thou came ft of thine owne good will, and therefor emayest do what thou thinkest good, but so is it not with me; for I am sent hither a Captaine by my countrey, to scrue the AGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honestie for metomake warre with them, whom I am sent to serue and aide : were it not that they themselves which fent me, do now commaund me the contrarie. This answer being made, he fent certaincoshis men to Sparta to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nectanebos. Both they also for their pans fent to intreate the councell of LACEDEMON: the one as being alwaies their friend and confederate, and the other promifing to be their faithfull friend thenceforth. The Lacen Euc-KIANS, having heard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilans should consider the standard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilans should consider the standard the requests of both, answered them openly, that Agesilans should consider the standard the requests of both. der of this matter; and wrote feeretly to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the common wealth of Sparta. So Agefilaus taking with him the mercenarie fouldiers which he had brought out of GRECE, went vnto Nectanchos, cloaking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his countrey, to bewray a wicked thing: but indeed taking away the vizard tobenefite his country, they might by a better name rightly have termed it treason, Howbeit y Lace-DAMONIANS placing the chiefest point of honor, to confist in the benefite of their country, did acknowledge nothing to be inflice, but that which they thought might ferue for the advancement of the glory of Sparta. Tachos feeing himselse forsaken thus by his mercenarie strange gers, fled. But now on the other fide, there arose another king in the citic of MENDES against this Nectanches who having leavied to the number of a hundred thousand fighting men, came to fight with Nectanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agefilaus, told him, that indeedthey were a great number of men of all forts together, and specially men of handie craft, and there fore that they were not to be feared, because they knew not what warre meant. But Agestism answered him againe: It is not their number that I feare, but their rudenesse and vnskilfulnesse, which is hardest of alto deceive. For warlike stratagems do most prevaile against menthathave greatest feare and experience: and therefore they foresee one thing rather then another. But men of no judgement nor experience, neither feare danger, nor have forecast, and thereforedo giue him no more advantage that seeketh to deceive them, then the wrastler by slight is able to overthrow him whom he cannot stirre nor remove. Afterwards the Mendestanking him felfe sent vinto Agestlaus, to winne him if he could. Nestanchos then began to be afraid. For when Agefilans counfelled him to try it by battell as foone as he could, and not to prolong this warre against ignorant men that had no skill to fight, but yet for their ouer-multirde might intrench him round about, and preuent him in diuers things: then he beganto feare

Age stlans hauing won Nettanebos againe to trust him, he once againe deceined his enemies with the like subtiltic wherewith he had first beguiled them, and which they knew not how to avoide. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to follow him: fodainely againe he would tains, and fled straggling here and there. Thus the affaires of this Egyptian king after that time had good fucceffe, and he was quietly stablished in his kingdome, making much of Agesilaus: and doing him all honor possible, prayed him to tarrie with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needs haften home to his countrey, which was in warre with others, knowing that his city of Spanta was without money, because they were driven to give pay to strangers. Thereupon The librar Nitlanebos in the end tooke his leave of him very honourably, presenting him a gift (besides all o Netlanebos Netlanebos therhonours he didhim of two hundred and thirty filuer talents in ready money, to defray the charges of the war in his country. Now though herein hesemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the worst, yet could he not thus scape the detrathing tongues of his ill-willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his wines, he would let passe and winke at many things that were against the profit of the common-wealth. THE LIFE OF Pompey.

He ROMAINE's feeme to have loved Pompey from his childhood, with the selfe affection that Prometheus in the tragedy of Aschylus appeareth to have borne vnto Hercules, after that he was delivered by him: when

> So great a hate I bare not to the father, But that I love the sonne of him much rather.

For the Romaines neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, then they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truly fo long as he liued, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for indeed he was a wheron his body lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villanie. Contratiwife, neuer any other Romains (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest good wils so some, nor that in prosperitie and aduersitie continued longer constant, then vnto Pompey. One onely cause procured the fathers hate, and that was, an unfatiable and greedy defire of money. But Pompeyhis , fon, was for many occasions beloued : as for temperance of life, aptnesses armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulnesse of word, and courtesse in conversation so that there was never manthatrequested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdaine, and took with great honor. Furthermore, being but a child, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good wils before he spake: for his countenance was fweet, mixed with granitic, and being come to mans state, there appeared in his gesture and behauior a graue and princely maiesty. His haire also stood a litle vpright, & the cast and foft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblance (as they said) of the statues & images of king Alexander. And because euery man gaue him that name, he did not refuseit himselfe: infomuch as there were some which sporting wise did openly call him Alexander. Wherupon Lucius Philippus a Confull, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Florathe curtifan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompel being a young man; telling that after she had lien with him, she could not possibly rise from him, but she must needs giue him some sweet quip or pleasant taunt. She would tell also how one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminius, fell in loue with her, and was a maruellous noble Captaine: but being stricken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare

This custome by report of ancient folke came vp in this maner. At what time the chiefest Peeres and Lords of Rome did rauish the Sabines daughters, which came to Rome to see common sports played, there chanced a sew rascals (as hog-heards or neat-heards) to carrie away a goodly faire woman. They fearing she should be taken from them, cryed out in the streets as they went, Talaflio, as if they would have said, she is for Talasius. This Talasius was a young gentleman well knowne, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named onely, did clappe their hands for ioy, and cryedout

So, hereof they say came this custome, that ener fince they have cryed this word Talassio vnto them that are newly maried, because the mariage of that faire yong maide proved fortunate, and happy vnto Talassius. And this methinkes foundeth nearest to the troth of that they report of this wedding cricos Talassio. Shortly after this indgement given Pomper maried Antistia. After that, going vnto Cinnaes campe, they wrongfully accused him of somewhat, whereupon he being afraid, secret. ly stole away. Now when they could not find him in Cianaes campe, there ranne straight ammour abroade, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did fet vpon him for this occasion. But he thinking to faue himselfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a private Captaine that followed him with his fword drawne in his hand. Ginns fecing him, felldowne on his knees before him, and tooke his feale from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tush, said the Captaine, I come not to scale any conenant, but to chastise a villaine and cruelltyrant: and therewithall thrush his fword through him, and flue him prefently. Cinna being flaine in this fort, Carbo fucceeded him, and tooke the government in hand, being a more cruell tyrant then the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, being wished for, and defired of the most part of the Romaines, for the grieuous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought themselues happie to change Gouernour: for their city was brought into fuch miferie, as hoping no more to fee Rome recourt her last libertie, they defired yet a more tolerable bondage. Now Pompeyat that time was inaplace of ITALY called PICENYM (now the marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more great loue and good will of the citie for his fathers fake. He feeing that the noblest men of Rom E forlooke their houses and goods, to flie from al parts vnto Syllaes campe, ss vnto a place of fafety, would not go to him as a fugitine and castaway to saue himselfe, without bringing him fome power to increase his armic, but would honourably go thither with an army, as he that meant first to do himselfe pleasure. So he selt the goodwill of the Picentines, who willingly took his part, and reiccted them that were fent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said: that Pompey which came from the schoole the last day, must now in hastebe a Captaine. Butthey were so offended with his speech, that they straight disparched him, and killed him out of hand. After that time Pompey being but three and twentie yeares old, tarying to receive no authoritie from any man, tooke it vpon him of himfelfe; and caufing atti-Dunall to befer vp in the middeft of the market place of Avx1 MVM, a great populous citie, he chiefraine commaunded the two brethren called the Ventidians (being the chiefest men of the citic, ar 23 years and they that for Carboes fake withstood his doings) without delay forthwith to anoidethecity:and fo began to leavie men, and to appoint Captaines, Sergeants of bands, Centeniers, and fuch other officers as appertaine to martiall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the fame marches, and did the like. They that tooke part with Carbo, fled every man, and all the reli willingly yeelded vnto him:wherby in short space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, carts, and all manner of beafts for eariage. In this fort he tookehis iourney towards Sylla, not in haste, as a man afraid to be met with by the way, but by small iour neys staying still where he might hurt his enemie, causing the cities euery where as he camero reuolt from Carbo. Neuerthelesse, three Captaines of the contrarie part, Carinna, Celius, and Brutus, all three did set vpon Pompey together, not all in a front, nor of one side, but in three feueral places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to have made him surearthesist withrie of onset. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting forth his force together in one place, he first she Maries marched against Brutus, having placed his horiemen (among the which he was himselfe in perfon) before the battell of his footmen. Now the men of armes of the enemie which were GAVLES, coming to give charge vpon him, he ran one of the chiefest among them through with his lance and flue him. The other GAVLES feeing him flaine, turned their backes, and brake their owne footmen: fo that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Captaines fell out among themselues, and some sted one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the rownes round about, thinking that they were dispersed for feare, came all into Pompey, and yeelded themselues. Afterwards Scipio the Consull coming against Pompey to fight with him, when hoth battels were in maner ready to joyne, before they came to throwing of their darts, Scipioes fouldiers faluted Pompeys men, and went on their fide: fo was Scipio driven to flie. And in fine. Carbo himselfe having sent after him divers troopes of horsemenby the river of Arsis, Pompey mode towards them, and did fo fiercely affaile them, that he draue them into fuch places as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon they seeing no way to scape, yeelded themselues horse and armours, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these overthrowes: wherefore, as soone he understood of it, fearing lest Pompey should miscarrie, being enuironned with so many Captaines of his enemies, he made haste to march towards him pomper forto aide him. Pompey vnderstanding of his approach, commanded his Captaines to arme with their men, and to put them in battell ray that their Generall might fee them brauely appointed 57lds. whenhe should present them vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would do him great honour, and indeed he did him more honour then Pompey looked for. For when Sylla faw him afarre off comming towards him, and his army marshalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly menthat fobrauely advanced themselves, being couragious for the victoric they had obtain ned of their enemies, he lighted on foot. When Pompey also came to do his dutie to him, and Pompey called him Imperator, (as much as Emperour, or foueraigne Prince) Sylta refaluted him with called Imthe felfe name, beyond all mens expectation prefent, litle thinking that he would have given fo 5112. honourable a name vnto fo young a man as Pompey, who had not yet been Senator : confidering that he himself did contend for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him every way, was answerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him he would rife and put off his cap to him, which The house hedidnot vnto any other noble men about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried no- Sylladid. thing the more in himselfe. Wherfore when Sylla would straight haue sent him into Gavlabe. cause Metellus that was there, was thought to have done no exploit worthy of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reason to displace an ancient Captaine that was of greater fame and experience than himselfe : yet if Metellus of himself were contented, and would intreate him, that he would willingly go and helpe him to end this war. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entring GAVLE, did wente to aid. of himselfe wonderful exploits, and did so reviue Metellus old courage and valiantnesse to fight, Metellus in which now began to faint, like boyling copper that being powred vpon the cold and hard copper, doth melt and diffolue it, as fast or faster then fire it selfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath been counted very strong, and the chiefest in all games, hauing euer borne, the prize away where he had wrestled, they never record among them his childish victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: even so I am afraid to speake of the wonderfull deeds that Pompey did in his childhood, because they are obscured in respect of the infinite great warres and battels which he had rompej. wonneafterwards. For I am affraide that whileft I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe ouer his chiefest acts and most notable enter-Prifes, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had oouercomeall ITALY, and was proclaimed Dictator, he did reward all his Lieutenants and Cap- pompey put taines that had taken his part, and did advance them to honourable place and dignity in the com- and his monwealth, frankly granting them all that they requested him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him liagand for his valiant neffe, and thinking that he would be a great flay to him in al his wars, he fought by maried fome meanes to allie him to him, Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Amilia, Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to mary Amyliathe daughter of Metella, & of her ter of sizefirst husband, the which also was another mans wife, and with child by her husband. These tellasal. mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllaes time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys na- laes wife.

The death of ture and condition: to fee Amylia, this new maried wife taken from her lawfull husband, to Antifina; mary her great with child; and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husband that did puther away. For Antistius was murthered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take part with Sylla for his sonne in law Pompeys sakes and her mother voluntarily put her felf to death, feeing her daughter received fuch open wrong,

By these apparant causes, those vn fortunate mariages fell out into a miserable tragedie, by means of the death of Emylia, who shortly after miserably died with child in Pompeys house. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into Sicile and that he had made all that Iland at his denotion, as a safe place to receive all Syllaes enemies: that Carbo also kept the sea thereapossiber fort bouts with a certaine number of flips: that Domitius also was gone into Africk B: and disert from Sylla Other noblemen that were banished, that had scaped his proscriptions and outlawries, were all in those parts. Against them was Pompey sent with a greatarmy. Howbeit he no sooner arrived in Sicile, but Perpenna left him the whole Hand, and went his way. There he fauourably dealt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miferie, and fetthem again ar libertie, the MAMERTINES onely excepted, which dwelt in the citie of MESSINA. They defixing his tribunall and jurifdiction, alledged the ancient order and priviledge of the Romains fet downe in times past amongst them. But Pompey answered them in choler: What do ye prattleto vs of your law, that have our fwords by our fides? It feemeth alfo that Pompey dealt too cruelly with Carbo in his miferic. For fith he must needs die, as there was no remedie but he should, then it had been better they had killed him when he was taken: for then they would have imputed it to his malice that fo had commanded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him, that had been thrife Confull at Rome, to be openly examined and he fitting in his chaire of flate or tribunall, condemned him to die in prefence of them all: to the great offence and misliking of cuery one that was present. So Pampey bade them takehim away and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the scaffold where he should be executed, and feeing the fword drawne that should cut off his head, he prayed the executioners to The death of give him a little respite & place to vntrusse a point, for he had a paine in his belly . Cours Oppinsal-To (one of Iulius C. Gars friends) writeth, that he dealt very cruelly in like maner with Quintus V4lerius. For Pompey, faid he knowing that he was excellently welllearned as any man could be & few like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him afide, and walked a few turns about then when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commanded his guard to cary him away, and to dispatch him. Howbeit we may not give too light credit to all that Oppius writeth, speaking of Iulius Cafars friends or foes, For Pompey indeed was copelled to make away the greatest personages of Syllaes enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken; but for the rest, althose that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was cotented to winke at it, and would not understand it:and moreover did helpe some besides to save themselues. Now Pompey was determined to hauctaken sharpe reuenge of the citic of the Hi-MERIANS, which had froutly taken the enemies part. But Sthenis one of the Gouernours of the city crauing audience of Pompey, told him he should do them wrong and iniustice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durst take vpon him to father the offence of them all, Sthenis answered straight, that it was himselfe, that had perswaded his friends, & compelled his enemies to do that which they did. Pompey being pleased to heare the franke speech and boldnesse of this man, first forgate him the fault he had committed, and consequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey understanding that his foldiers did kill divers men in the high waies, he sealed up altheir fwords, and whose seale soeuer was broken, he was well fauouredly punished. Pompey being bufie about these matters in Sicile, received letters and commission from Sylla and the Senate, to depart thence immediatly into Africk f. to make war vpon Domitius with all his power, who had leavied already more men of war, then Marius had, not long before, when he came out of Africk Einto Italy: and had there ouerthrowne all the Romaines doings, being become of a fugitive outlaw, a cruell tyrant. Pompey thereupon having speedily put himselfe in readinesse to take the feas, left Memmius his fifters husband governor of Sicil E and so himself imbarked, & thousand soldiers from the enemies, and yeelded themselves, besides seve whole legions that he brought with him. They say moreouer, that at his arrivall, he had a present chance happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his fouldiers stumbled on atreafure by chance, and got thereby a great maffe of money. The refidue of the army hearing that thought fore that the field where this treasure was found, was full of gold and filter, which the CARTHAGINIAN'S had hiddenthere long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereuron, for many dayes after, could have no rule of his fouldiers; neither could he choose but hugh to fee fo many thousand men digging the ground, and turning up the field: untill in pomitive the end they wearied themselves, and came and prayed him then to leade them where he camped by thought good, for they had payed well for their folly. Domitius came to Pompey, with his armieset in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quagmire before him, that ranne with a army. fwift running streame, very ill to get ouer; besides that, from the very breake of day it had powreddowne and rained fo fast, and was so great a wind withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they should not fight, commanded his people to trusse away, and remoue. Pompey on the other fide, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, fodainly made his men to march, and passed over the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order, were maruelloufly amazed, and in that hurly burly would have made refiftance. But they were neithe rall together, nor yet evenly fet in battell ray, and had befides the wind beating the raine full intheir faces. So did the storme much hurt vnto the Romaines also, for they could not one fecanother: infomuch as Pompey himfelfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his ownefouldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and was fomewhat pempeys long before he answered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowne his enemies with great flaugh victories ter, (for they fay, that of twenty thousand of them, there were but three thousand sauced) Pomper fouldiers faluted him by the name of Imperator : but he answered them, that he would not eccept the honor of that name, so long as he saw his enemies campe yet standing : and therefore, if it were fothey thought him worthy of that name, that first they should overthrow the trench and fort of their enemies, wherein they had intrenched their campe. The fouldiers when they heard him fay fo, went prefently to affault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to avoide the likedanger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the camp by force, and in it flue Domitius. After that ouerthrow, the cities in that countrey came and yeelded themselues, some wil- Larbes. lingly, and others taken by force: as also they tooke king Iarbas that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was gine to Hiempfal. But Pompey being defirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his army, went many daies journey into the maine land, and still conquered all wherehe came, making the power of the Romaines dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that countrey, the which made but small account of them at that time. He sayd moreover, that the wild beafts of Africke also should feele the force and good successe of the Romains and thereupon he bestowed a few dayes in hunting of Lyons and Elephants. For it is reported, that infortie dayes space at the vitermost, he had ouercome his enemies, subdued Africke, and hadestablished the affaires of the kings and kingdomes of that countrey, being then but foure conquests as andtwenty yeares old. So when he returned vnto the citie of Vrica, letters were brought 24 years from Sylla, willing him to discharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion onely, The lowe of tarying the coming of another Captaine that should be sent o succeed him in the gouernment the souldsof that country. This commandement gricued him not a little, though he made no shew of it retund the base has been dead from the following former. atall : but his fouldiers shewed plainly that they were offended, For when Pompey prayed them to depart, they began to give out broad speeches against sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (what socuer became of them) to for sake him, and they would not that he should trust vnto a tyrant. Pompey seeing that he could not perswade them by any reason to be quiet, rose out of his chaire and retired into his tent weeping. But the souldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chaire of state, where he spent a great part of the day, they intreating him to remaine there and command them, and he defiring them to obey Sylla, and leave their mutinies. But in fine, seeing them importunate to presse him to it, he sware he would kill himselfe, rather then they should compell him, yet they scant lest him thus. Hercupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Sylla when he heard that, sayd to his friends: Well, then I fee it ismy destinie in mine old dayes to fight with children. He meant so, because of Marius the yonger, who had done him much mischiefe, and had besides put him in great danger. But afterwards vnderstanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in Rome led Magnet were determined to go and meete Pompey, and to receive him with all the honor they could; because he would go beyond them all in shew of good will, he went out of his houseto meete him, and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to say hoissed faile with fixescore gallies, and eight hundred other ships or bottomes, to transport their to Afriche victuals, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage what society. After he was anded with all his fleet, part at VTICA, and part at CARTHAGE, there straight came to him seven great and commanded all them that were present to give him that name also. This not with slanding fome fay, that it was in Africk E this name was first ginen him by a common cry of all his wholearmy, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. Indeed it is true, that Pompey himself being fent Proconful into Spain E, long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so comonly knowne and accepted, as no man did enuicit. And therefore rightly is the wisedome of the ancient lo. MAINES to be both commended and had in admiration, which did not onely reward fernice in for rewards the field with fuch honourable names and titles, but civill fernice and good government also peace at home. For there were two, who the people of Rome called Maximi, to fay, very great of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwist the people and Senate: the other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certain bondmen infinnchifed, who through their riches and fauour had obtained that place. After that, Fungery required the honor of triumph, but sylla denied it, alleadging that none could enter in triuph into Rome but Confuls or Prators. For fith Scipio the first, who in Spain thad ouercomethe Cartha-GINIANS, neuer desired this honour of triumph, being neither Consull nor Prætor, muchlesse should he stand vpon demaund of triumph into Rome, when that through his yong yeares he was not yet a Senator and befides, it would purchase him enuic of his honor and greames. These reasons did Sylla alleadge against Pompey and told him plainly that if he were bent to stadinit, he wold refist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men didhonor the rifing, nor the fetting of the Sunmeaning therby, how his owne honor increased, & Syllats diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he said; but perceiting by their countenaces that flood by, that they wondred at it, he asked what it was he faid, When it was told him, he maruelled at the boldnesse of so youg a man, and then cried out twise together, Let him then the umph a gods name. Many being offended therwith, Pompey (as it is reported) to angerthemore, would needs be brought in in triumphant chariot drawne with foure Elephants: for he hadtaken many of them from those Kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gareof the citie being too narrow, he was driven to leave the Elephants, and was contented to be drawn in with horses. Now his foldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised the, going about to trouble and hinder his triumph; he said, he passed not for it, and thathe would rather let alone all his preparation of triumph, then once to yeeld to flatter them. Wheruposthere was a famous man at that time called servilius who at the first was one of the chiefest against Pompeys triumph, who said openly, Now I know that Pompey indeed is great, and deserueth triumphibeing cuident enough, that if he would, he might then have cafily beenemade Senator: he fued not for that, but as they fay, fought honor by a stranger meane lesse honourable. For if he had been made Senator so yong, it had not been so great a matter; but to have such honor before he was Senator, that was maruelloufly to be noted. But this wan him the more sauor and goodwill still amongst the common people for they were glad when after his triumphthey faw him in company amongst the Romaine knights. On the other fide, it spited syllato sechim come fo fast forward, and to rife to fo great credite: notwithstanding being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to keepe it to himfelfe vntill that Pompey by force, and against Syllarswil, had brought Lepidus to be Confull, by the helpe and good will of the people that furthered his defire. Therupon sylla feeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honour him, he fayd vnto him: O yong man, I fee thouat glad of this victorie, and so hast thou cause; for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to have had such fauour of the people, as for thy sake to have made Lepides Consull (the vile st person of all men) sed Confulla before Catulus the honestest man of the citie: but I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy businesse, for thou hast advanced a dangerous enemie to thy felic Now the chiefest thing wherein Sylla discouered most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last wil and testament: for he gaue Legacies vnto enery one of his friends, and some of them hemade tutors and ouerfeers of his fonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithflat ding Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would have kept Syllus bodie from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funerall should not be openly solemnized, he contrary wise brought him very honourably and safely to the ground. Shortly after syllass death, his words of prophecievnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proved true. For Lepidus Ville ping the authority which sylla had before, not colourably, but openly entred fraight marmes, firring up againe those of Marius faction, whom Syllacould not be auenged of, and which lay furking a long time, fpying for occasion to rise againe. True it is, that his colleague and fellow Confull Catulus (whom the best and soundest part of the people followed) was thought a marnellous honest man, both iust and modest: howbeit, a better gouernor in peace, then a good man ofwarre, infomuch as time required Pompeys skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose himselfe, but tooke part straight with the Nobilitie and honeselt men, and was prefently chosen Captaine of their army against Lepidus, who had alreadie wonne the greatest part of ITALY, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAVLB onthis side the mountaines called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the rest. Pomper, cassily overcameit: howbeithe lay along time before Mo Do NA, befieging of Brutus. In the meane feafon Levidus came to Rom E, and being hard at the walles demaunding the fecond Confulship, made them afraid in the citie with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all forts. Howbeitthis feare was cooled straight, by a letter which Pompey lent to Rome, aduertifing how he had ended this warre without any bloud shed: for Brutus either betraying his army. or being betrayed of it, yeelding himselfe vnto Pompey, who gave him a certaine number of horsmenthat conducted him vnto a litle towne vpon the river of Po; where the next day after, Gemining being fent by Pompey, flue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had writtenletters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put himselfe into his hands: and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burthened him for putting him to by Pompey. death. Thus Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwards by the helpe of Cassius flue inlins Cefur: howbeit he shewed not himselfe so like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did as we have declared more at large in his life; Furthermore Lepidus being driven to forfake Italy, fled into SAR DINIA, where he died (as it is reported) of a ficknes that he had, not for any forrow or griefe of his owne affaires, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his The death of heart, knowing thereby that his wife had plaied the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius Lipidus. in Spaine, who was another maner of warrier then Lepidus, and that kept the Romaines in great awe: for that all the fugitiues of the late civill wars were fled to him, as from the last disease of the warres. He had alreadie ouerthrowne many inferiour Captaines, and was now wreftling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble fouldier, but now being old, made warres butflowly, and would not couragiously take present occasions offered him, which Sertorius by The vallhis simblenesse and dexterity took out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when seriorius is hethought least of him, like a Captaine rather of theeues then of soldiers, and would still ay ambushes in enery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heavie armed. Hercupon Pompey keeping his army alway together, practifed at Rome that he might be fent into Spaine to aide Metellus, But not with standing that Catulus commanded him to disperse his army, Pompey still kept them together by colour ofnew deuices, and was continually about Rome in armes, until that by Lucius Philippus means hehad obtained the gouernment of that country. They fay, that one of the Senators maruelling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: How now Philip, doest thou then thinke it meete to fend Pompey Proconfull (to fay, for a Conful) into Spain E: No truly, faid Philip, not Proconfull onely, but pro Confulibus, (to fay, for both Confuls) meaning that both the Pompeys Confuls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arrived in Spaine, men iourneyinte began straight to be cariedaway (as the maner is commonly where no gouernours be) with the hope of athing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out proud and bitter words torius. against Pompey, faying in mockery, he would have no other weapon but rods to whip this yong boy, if he were not afraid of this old woman, meaning Metellus the old man. But not with standingthese gallant brags, he stood better vpon his guard, and went stronger to fight then he did before, being afraid of Pompey. For Metellus was very diffolute of life (which no man would have Metellus indged in him) and was given over too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in him a simentor riot maruellous fodaine change, both of his honour and glorie which he vsed before, as also the cutting off of his superfluous expence. That thing, besides that he did honour Pompey greatly by it, wan himalfo much more the goodwil of the people, whe they faw that he drew himself downe to a straighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne disposition he was a graue man and temperatly giue for his defires. In this war fortune changed diverfly, as it is commonly feene in wars but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the citie of LAVRON.

Furthermore, confidering that of nature he was not to be won by extreamitie, and that by gentle meanes and perswafion he could make him doe what he would, he euer sought rather to perfwade then command him in any thing he had to doe. For Philip having wonne & taken before, the city of $TA-GIRA, where Ariffule was borne, for his fake he built it again, and replenished it with inhabitants which fied away, or otherwise werein bondage. He appointed the for a schoolehouse and dwelstebure in ling place, the pleafat house that is by the citie of MIEZA. In that place are yet seene seats of stone which Ariflotle canfed to be made & close walks to walk in the shadow. It is thought also, that Alexander did not only learne of Ariffette morall Philosophy and humanity, but also he heard of him other more feerer hard, and grave doctrine, which Artholes feholers do properly cal Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things speculative, which requireth the masters teaching to underfland them, or elfe are kept fro comon knowledge: which feiences, they did not comonly teach, Alexander being passed into As 1 A and hearing that Aristotle had put out certaine books of that matter, for the honors fake of Philosophy:he wrote a letter vnto him, somewhat too plaine, and of this effect. Alexander vnto Ariffetle greeting, Thou hast not done wel to put forth the Acroamaticall feiences. For wherein shall we excell other, if those things which thou hast secretly taught vs, be made common to all? I do thee to understand, that I had rather excell others in excellencie of knowledge then in greatnes of power. Farwell. Whereunto Ariffotle to pacificthis his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that these bookes were published, and not publifled. So that it is written as a memorial for the that have bin entred & brought vp in the Peripateticke feet & doctrine. It feemeth also, that it was Aristotle about all other, that made Alexander take delight to study Physicke. For Alexander did not only like the knowledge of speculation, but wold exercise practise also, and helpe his friends when they were ficke: & made besides certaine remedies, & rules to line by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his ownenature he was much given to his booke & defired to reade much. Helearnedal-Somethinke fo the Iliades of Homer of Aristotoles correctio, which they cal the ze vog Onzos the corrected, as harelate flood using passed under the rule: & said it enery night under his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Oneficrates writeth) the inftitution of martiall discipline, And when he was in the high countries of As 12, where he could not readily come by other books, he wrote vnto Harpalus to fendthe was found to him. Harpalus fent him the histories of Philifus, with divers tragedies of Eurypides, Sophocles, and Afchylus: & certaine hymnes of Telestus & Philoxenus. Alexander did reverence Aristotle at the first, as his father, & so he tearmed him; because from his natural father he had life, but fro him, the knowledge to liue. But afterwards he suspected him somewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he fo friendly to him as he had been: whereby men perceived that he did not beare him the good will he was wont to do. This not with standing, he left not that zeale and defire he had to the studie of Philosophie, which he had learned from his youth, and still continued with him. For he shewed diverse testimonies thereof. As the honour he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philosopher. The fiftie talents which he fent vnto Xonocrates, Damdamis, and Calanus: of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but fixteene yeares old, was left his Lieutenant in Macedon, with the custodic and charge of his great feale: at what time he also subdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled against him; and having won their city by assault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it, of fundry nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to fay, the citie of Alexander. He was with his fatheratthe battell of CHERONEA against the GRECIANS, where it was

ALEXANDER THE GREAT. reported, that it washe that gaue charge first of all vpon the holy band of the Thebanes. Furthermore, there was an old oke feene in my time, which the countrimen commonly call Alexan-

ders okc, because his tent or paullion was fastned to it; and not farre from thence is the charnell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were flaine at the battel. For these causes, his father Philip loued him very dearely, and was glad to heare the Macedonians call Alexander king, and himself their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fel out in his court afterwards by reason of Philips new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and strife among st the women: for the mischiefe of dissention & icalousie of women, doth separate the harts of kings one from another, whereof was chiefest cause, the sharpenesse of Olympias, who being a icalous woman, Thequarels fretting, and of a reuenging mind, did incense Alexander against his father. But the chiefe cause that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus, at the mariage of Cleopatra, whom Philip maried a maiden, piesand falling in fancy with her when himselfe was past mariage. This was the matter: Attalus being vn-Alexander, cle ynto this Cleopatra, fell drunke at the mariage, and haning in his cups, he perfwaded the Ma-CEDONIANS that were at the feast, to pray to the gods, that they might have a lawfull heire of Philip and Cleopatra, to fucceed him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith, threw a cup at his head, and faid vnto him: Why, traitor, what am I: dost thou take me for abaltard? Philip seeing that, rose from the boord, and drew out his sword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choler and wine, he fell downe on the ground. Then Alexander mocking him, Lo, faid he to the MACEDONIANS, here is the manthat prepared to go out of Evrop Einto Asia, and stepping onely from one bed to another, ye see him laid along on the ground. After this great infolencie, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, mocketh and carying her into his country of EpiRvs, he left her there, and himself afterwards went into Philip ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demaratus Corinthian, a friend of king Philips, and very familiar with him, came to fee him. Philip when he had courteoully welcomed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agreetogether. Truly, Oking, quoth he, it imports you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is fo full of quarell and contention. These words nipped Philip in such sort, and caused him to know his fault, that through Demaratus meanes, whom he sent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come back againe. Now when Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (defiring for neceffities fake, to enter in league and friendship with Philip) offered his eldest daughter in mariage vnto Arideus king Philips fon, and had fent Aristocritus ambassador into MACEDON for that purpose the friends of Alexander and his mother, began againe to inueigle him with new reports & suspitions, how Philip by this great mariage would aduance Aridaus, to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire gotten of a in the kingdome. Alexander being netled therewith, fent one Theffalus a player of tragedies into Cariato Pexederus, to perswade him to leane Arideus, that was abastard and a foole, and rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleased Pexodorus far better, to have Alexander his son in law, then Aridaus. Philip understanding this, went himselfe into Alexanders chamber, taking Philotas with him (the son of Parmenio) one of his familiars, and bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a base mind, & was voworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would cast himselfe away, marying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a slaue and subject of a barbarous king. Thereupon he wrote letters vnto Corinth, that they should fend Thessalus bound vnto him. And furthermore, he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius and Ptolomie, his fonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, and placed the in great authoritie about him. Shortly after, Paufanias sustaining villanie by the coun-ger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspition of this murther. For some say that Pausanias after this villany was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had been abused: who recited these verses of Euripides to him, inthe tragedie of Medea,

The begin- flaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON attwenty yeares of age; and found his realmegreatly enuied and hated of dangerous enemies, and euery way full of danger. For the barbarous nations that were neare neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of ftrangers, but defired to have their naturall kings. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GRECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but having a little altered y governments, had through his infolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long been acquainted to obey. Thereupon Alexanders councell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should vtterly forsake the affaires of GRECE, and not to follow them with extremity, but that he shold seeke to win the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, & wifely to remedy these new stirs, Bur he far otherwise determined to stablish his safety by courage and magnanimity: perswading himselfe, that if they saw him stoope and yeeld at the beginning, how litle so ener it were, energy one would be vpon him. Thereupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them fodainely with his army, by the river of Danvar, where in a great battell he overthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, having intelligence that § THE EANS were revolted, and that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his army towards the straight of Thermopiles, faving that he wold make Demosthenesthe Orator fee (who in his orations, whilest he was in ILLY REAL and in the country of the Triballians, called him child) that he was growne a stripling paf. fing through THESSALIE, and should find him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his army vnto the gates of THEFFS, he was willing to give them of the city occasion to repent them : and therefore onely demanded Phanix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion, Furthermore, he proclaimed by trumpet, pardon and fafety vnto all them that would yeeld vnto him. The THEBANS on the other fide, demanded of him Philotas and Antipater, two of his chiefeft feruants, & made the crier proclaime in the city, that all fuch as would defend the liberty of GRECE should joyne with them. Then did Alexander leave the MACEDONIANS at liberty to make war with all cruelty. The THEBANS also fought with greater courage and defire then they were able, confidering that their enemies were many against one. And on the other fide also, when the garriion of the Macedonians which were within the castle of Cadm Aca, made a fallic vpon them, and gaue them charge in the rereward: then they being enuironed of all fides, Thebeswon were flaine in maner cuery one of them, their city taken, destroyed, and razed cuento the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GRECE afraid by example of this great calamity & miferic of the THEBANS, to the end none of the should dare from thencefoorth once to rise against him. He would cloke this cruelty of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the Phocians & Plateians: who complaining to him of the iniuries the The-EAN'S had offered, could not deny them inflice. Notwithstanding, excepting the priests, and the religious, and all fuch as were friends vnto any of the Lords of MAGEDON, all the friends and kinfmen of the poet Pindarus, & all those that had disswaded them which were the rebels, he sold all the rest of the citie of THERES for slaves; which amounted to the number of thirty thousand persons besides that were slaine at the battel, which were sixe thousand moe. Now amongst the other miseries & calamities of the poore city of THEBES, there were certain THRACIANIOL diers, who having spoiled and defaced the house of Timoclea, a vertuous lady, & of noble parentage, they decided her goods among them : and their Captaine having rauished her by force, afked her, whether she had any where hidden any gold or silver. The lady told him she had. Then leading him into her garden, she brought him vnto a wel; where she faid she had cast al her iewels and precious things, when she heard the city was taken. The barbarous THRACIAN stooped to looke into the wel: the standing behind him, thrust him in, & then threw stones enough on him, and so killed him. The fouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, and so caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander faw her countenance, & marked her gate, he supposed her at the first to be some great lady she followed the souldiers with such a maiestie and boldnesse. Alexander then asking her what she was : she answered, that she was the sister of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of CHERON EA, where being general he was flaine, valiantly fighting for the defence of the liberty of GRECE. Alexander wondering at her nobleanfwer and couragious deed, commanded no man should touch her nor her children, and so freely let her go whither she wold. He made league also with the Athenians, though they were very fory for their miserable fortune. For the day of the solemne feasts of their mysteries being come they left it off, mourning for the THEBANS : courteoufly entertaining all those, that flying from THEBES came to the for fuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was past him, following therein the nature of Lyons: or because that after so great an example of cruelty, he would shew a fingular clemency againe: he did not onely pardon the ATHENIANS of all faults committed, but did also counsell them to looke wisely to their doings, for their citie one day should command all GRECE, if he chanced to dye. Men report, that certainely he oftentimes repented him that he had dealt fo cruelly with the THEBANS, and the griefe he tooke vpon it was cause that he afterwards shewed himselfe more mercifull vnto diuerse others. Afterwards also he did blame the fury of Bacchue, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being drunke, and the Mace Donians also to refuse him to go any further to conquer the Indians, which was an imperfection of his enterprise, and a minishing also of his honour. Besides, there was neuer THEBAN afterwards, that had escaped the fury of his victory, and did make any perition to him, but he had his suite. Thus was the estate of THEBES as you have heard. Then the GRE-

CIANS having affembled a generall councell of all the states of GREECE within the straights of PELOPONNESUS, there it was determined that they would make warre with the PERSIANS. Alexander

Whereupon they chose Alexander Generall of all GREECE. Then diverse men coming to these Generals of all GREECE. where the same of election, he looked that Diogenes Sinopian (who dwelt at Coninth) wold likewise come as the rest had done: but when he saw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept still in the suburbes of Corinth, at a place called Cranium, he went himselfe vnto him, and found him laid allalong in the Sunne. When Diogenes faw fo many coming towards him, he fatevp a little, alexanders and looked full vpon Alexander. Alexander courteously spake vnto him, and asked him, if he talks with lacked any thing. Yea faidhe; that I do: that thou ftand out of my Sunne a litle. Alexander Digenti. was fo well pleased with this answer, and maruelled so much at that great boldnesse of this man, to see how small account he made of him that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, and mocking him, he told them: Masters say what you list, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being defirous to heare what the Oracle of Apollo Delphian would say vnto him touching the successe of his journey into Asia, he went vnto the citic of Delphes. It chanced so that he came thither in the daies which they call vnfortunate, on which daies no man vsed to aske Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he sent first vnto the Nunne which pronounced the Oracles to pray her to come vnto him. But she refused to come, alleadging the custome which forbad her to go. Thereupon, Alexander, went thither himselse in person, and brought her out by forceinto the temple. She seeing then that he would not be denied, but would needs haue his will, told him: My fonne, for that I fee thou art innincible. Alexander hearing that, fayd, he defired no other Oracle, and that he had as much as he looked for. Afterwards when he was euen ready to goe on with his voyage, he had diverfe fignes and tokens from the gods: and amongst other, an image of the Poet Orpheus made of cyprus, in the city of LEBETHRES, in those daies did sweate maruellously. Many men fearing that pearing vnfigne, Aristanderthe soothsayer bad Alexander be of good cheare, and hope well; for he should to Alexander obtaine noble victories that should never be forgotten, the which should make the poets and bis iourney mustians sweate to write and fing them. Then, for his army which he led with him, they that do into Asia. fet downe the least number, fay, that they were thirty thousand footmen, and five thousand horsmen:& they that say more; do write; four eand thirty thousand footmen, and four ethousand horsemen. Aristobulus writeth, that Alexander Had no more butthreescore and rentalents to asia. pay his fouldiers with: and Duris writeth, that he had no more prouifion of victuals, then for thirty daies only. And Onesicritus sayeth moreouer, that hedid owe two hundred ralents. Now, notwithstanding that he began this warre with so small ability to maintaine it, he would neuer takeship before he vnderstood the state of his friends, to know what ability they had to go with line of Ahim, and before he had given vnto fome, lands, and vnto others, a towne, and to others againe, the custome of some hauen, Thus by his bounty, hauing in maner spent almost the reuenues of the crowne of Macedon, Perdiccas asked him: My Lord, what will you keepe for your selfer. Hope, sayd he. Then, quoth Perdiceas againe, we will also have some part, fince we go with you: and fo refuled the reuenew which the king had given him for his pension. Many others did also the like. But fuch as were contented to take his liberalitie, or would aske him anything, he Mmm 4

gaue them very frankly, and in such liberalitie spent all the reuenew he had. With this defire and determination, he went on to the straight of HELLESPONT, and going to the citie of ILLYM he didfacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy gods (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROIA, whose bodies were buried there) and specially voto Achilles, whose grave he anointed with oile, and ranne naked round about it with his familiars. according to the ancient custome of funerals. Then he covered it with no legaies and flowers. faying, that Achilles was happy, who while he lived had a faithfull friend, and after his death an excellent herauld to fing his praise. When he had done, and went vp and downe the citie to free all the monuments and notable things there, one asked him, if he would fee Paris harpe, He answered againe, he would very faine see Achilles harpe, who played and sung vpon it all the facmous acts done by valiant men in former times. In the meane time, Durius king of P B R S IA hauing leavied a great army, fent his Captaines and Lieutenants to tary Alexander at the river of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely barre to stop his entry into Asia. Moreover, the Captaines of the councell about him, were afraid of the depth of this river, and of the height of the banke on the other fide, which was very high and steepe and could not be won without fighting. And some fayd also that he should have special care of the ancient regard of the moneth; because the kings of MACEDON did neuer vie to put the army into the field in the moneth of Dason, which is June. For that, sayd Alexander, we will remedy foone: let them call it the fecond moneth, Artemifium, which is May. Furthermore Parmenia was of opinion, that he shold not meddle the first day, because it was very late. Alexander made answeragaine, that Hellespont wold blush for shame, if he were now afraid to passe oner the riuer, fince he had already come ouer an arme of the sea. Thereupon he himselfe first entredthe riuer with thirteene guidons of horfemen, and marched forwards against an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies flot at him, as he was coming up the other banke, which was very high and freepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which staid to receive him in battell ray, thrusting his men downe into the river, which was very deepe, and ranne fo fwift, that it almost caried them downe the streame; infomuch that men thought him more rash then wife, to leade his men with such danger. This notwithstanding he was so wilfully bent that he would needs ouer, and in the end with great ado recoursed the other fide, specially because the earth slidde away, by reason of the mudde. So when he was oner he was driuen to fight pell mell man to man, because his enemies did set vpon the first that were pasfed ouer, before they could put themselves into battell ray, with great cries, keeping their horses very close together, and fought first with their darts, and afterwards came to the sword when their darts were broken. Then many of them let vpon him alone, for he was cafilie to be knowne about the rest by his shield, and the hinder part of his helmet, about the which, there hung from the one fide to the other, a maruellous faire white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Roesaces and Spithridates, both two chiese Captaines of the Persians, setting upon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding ftraight to Roefaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him fuch a blow with his launce, that he brake it in his hand, and ftraight drew out his fword. But fo foone as they two had closed together, Spithridates comming at the one fide of him, raised himselfe you his stirrops, and gave Alexander with all his might fuch a blow on his head with a battellaxe, that he cut the creast off his clium faned helmet, and one of the fides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battellaxe Alexander. touched the very haire of his head. And as he was lifting up his hand to strike Alexander againe, great Clitus preventing him, thrust him through with a partisan; and at the very fame instant, Roefaces fell dead from his horse with a wound which Alexander gave him with his fword. Now whileft the horfemen fought with fuch furie, the fquadron of the battell of the Macedonians footmen had passed the river, and both the battels began to march slexanders one against the other. The Persians stucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight villorie of turned their backes and fled, fauing the GRECIANS which tooke pay of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander fetting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horse killed under him, being thrust through the slanke with a fword. This was not Bucephall, but another horse he had. All his menthat were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurt amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were flaine at this first battell, twenty thousand footmen of these barbarous people, and two thousand fine hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobalus writeth; that there were flaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footmen. Alexander to honour their valiantnesse, caused every one of their images to be made in brasse by Lysppus. And because he would make the GRECIANS partakers of this victoric, he sent vnto the ATHE All and three hundred of their targets, which he had won at the battell; and generally vponall the otherspoiles he put this honorable inscription: Alexander the some of Philip, es the Grecians, excepting the Lacedemonians, have wonne this spoile upon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of gold or filuer, also purple silkes, or other such precious things which he got among y Persians, he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victoric of Alexander, brought such a sudden change amongst the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the city selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe citie of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the left through all the low countries and coasts vponthe fea, yeelded straight vnto him; and the restalfo, saving HALICARNASSVS and MILETYM, which did still refiss him: howbeit at length, he tooke them by force. When he hadso conquered all there about, he stood in doubt afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruellous defire, horly to follow Darius wherefocuer he were, and to venture all at a battell. Another time againe, he thought it better first to occupie himselfe in conquering these low countries, and to make himselfe strong with the money and riches he should find among them, that he might afterwards be the betterable to follow him. In the country of Lydia nearevnto the city Xanthym, they fay, there is a fpring that brake of it felf, & ouerflowing the banks about it, cast out a litle table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certaine caracters in old letters, which faid that the kingdome of the Persians should be destroyed by the GRECIANS. This did further so encourage Alexander, that he made hast to cleare all the sea coast, even as far as CILICIA & PHOENICIA. But the wonderful good fuccesse he had, running along all the coast of PAMPHILIA, gaue diverse historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the world, thatthe fury of the fea, which vnto all other was extreme rough, and many times would fwell owertherops of the high rockes vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him, And it appeareth that Menander himselse in a comedy of his, doth witnesse this wonderfull happinesse of Alexander, when merily he fayth:

> o ereat Alexander, how great is thy state? For thou with thy selfe mayest thus instly debate: If any man living I lift for to call, He cometh, and humbly before me doth fall. And if through the surges my tourney do by, The waves give me way, and the fea becomes dry.

Yet Alexander himselfe simply writeth in his epistles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passed a place called the ladder, and that to passe there, he tooke ship in the citie of Phasell-DES. There he remained many daies: and when he faw the image of Theodectes PHASELITAN, flanding in the market place, he went in adaunce thither one cuening after supper, and cast The minds flowers and garlands vpon his image, honoring the memory of the dead, though it feemed but in 77 of Thornton fport, for that he was his companion when he liued, by meanes of Aristotle and his philosophy.

After that he ouercame also the Pisidians, who thought to have resisted him; and conquered alexander, all Phrygia besides. There in the city of Gondivs, which is said to be the anciet seat of king Midas, he saw the charret that is so much spoken of, which is bound with the barke of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a troth, of the barbarous people, that they beleeued it as a prophecy: Gordin in that who foeuer could vidoe the band of that barke, was certainly ordained to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander proming to vide the band, and finding world. no ends to vndoe it by, they were so many fold wreathed one within the other, he drew out his sword, and cut the knot in the middest: so that then many ends appeared. But Aristobalus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret, and so seuered them a sunder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPHLAGONIANS and CAPPADOCIANS; and understood of the death of Memnon; that was Darius Generall of his army by sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to go on with his determination, to leade hisarmy into the high countries of As IA. Then did king Darius himselfe come against Alexander, having leavied a great power at SvsA, of fixe hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wi fards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darins dreamed that he faw all the army of the MACEDONIANS On afire, and Alexander serving of him in the selfe same attire that he himselfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predecctfor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he suddenly vanished from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS should have noble successe in their doings, and that Alexander should conquer all Asia, even as king Darius had done, when he was but Asgandes vnto the king: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honour. This furthermore made him bold also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in Cilicia. supposing it had been for that he was affraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sicknessehe had, the which some say he got by extreme paines and travell, & others also, because he washed Schnesse in himself in the river Cydnus, which was cold as Ice. Howsoever it came, there was none of theo. ther physitians that durst vindertake to cure him, thinking his disease vincurable, and no medicins to prevaile that they could give him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIANS would lay itto their charge, if Alexander miscaried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, considering his master was very ill, and bearing himselfe of his love and good will towards him, thought he should not do that became him, if he did not proue (feeing him in extremity & danger of life) the vtmost remedies of phisicke, what danger socuer he put himselfe into; and therefore tooke vpon him to minister vnto Alexander, and perswaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, and goto the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrot him a letter from the campe, aductifing him, that he should beware of Philip his physitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches that he would give him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his master Alexander when he had read this letter, laid it vnder his beds head, and made none of his nearest familiars acquainted therewith. When the houre came that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, and brought a cup in his hand with the potion he should drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, and withall, chearfully tookethe cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the fight, how one reading the letter, and the other drinking the medicine both at one instant, they looked one vpon another, howbeit not both with like chearefull countenance. For Alexander looked merily vpon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his physitian Philip, and how much he loued him: and the physitian also beheld Alexander like a man perplexed and amazed, to be so falfly accused; and straight lift up his hands to heaven, calling the godsto witnesse, that he was innocent; and then came to Alexanders bed fide, and prayed him to be of good cheare, and boldly to do as he would aduise him. The medicine beginning to worke overcame the difeafe, and draue for the time, all his naturall strength and powers to the lowest parts of his bodie : in so much as his speech failed him, and he fell into such a weakenesse, and almost fwounding, that his pulse did scant beate, and his sences were wel-neare taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few daies recouered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed himselfe openly vnto the Mac BDONIANS for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health vntill they had seene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a MACEDONIAN, and banish out of his countrey, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Darius meant to meete with Alexander within the straights and vallies of the mountaines, befought him to tary rather where he was, being a plaine open countrey round about him; confidering that he had a great hoast of mento fight with a few enemics, and that it was most for his advantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius answered himagaine, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amytetas replyed: For that Oking, I pray you feare not: for I warrant you vpon my life he wilcome to you, yea and is now onwards on his way coming towards you. All these perswasions of A myntas could not turne Darius from making his camp to march towards Cilicia. At the felfe fame time alfo, Alexander went towards Syria to meet with him. But it chanced one night that the one of them miffed the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe; Alexander being glad of this hap, and making haft to meet with his enemie within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the flraights, began then to find the fault and error committed: for that he had shut himfelfe vp in the straights (holden in on the one side with the mountaine, and on the other with the sea, and the river of Pindarus that ranne betweene both) and that he was driven to disperse his army into diuerse companies, in a stony and ill fauored country, ill for horsemen to trauel, being on the contrary fide a great advantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footmen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wish it to fight for his advantage, fo could he tell excellently well how to fet his men in battell ray to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the leffe number by many then his enemie, yet he had such policy and cast with him, that he foresaw all, and would not be enuironed. For he did put out the right wing of his battell a great deale further then he did his left wing, and fighting himfelfin the left wing in the formost rankes, he made al the barbarous people flie that stood before Daviss and him howbeit, he was hurton his thigh with a blow of a fword. Chares writeth, that Darius discander felfedid hurt him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding Alexander selfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater, fayth, that indeed he was hurt on the thigh with a fword, howbeit it put him to no danger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurt him. Thus having wona famous victory, and slaine aboue a hundred and tenthousand of his enemies, he could not yettake Darius, because he fled, hauing still foure or fine furlongs vantage before him: howbeit he tooke his charret of battell wherein he fought, and his bow also. Then he returned from the chase, and found the MACEDONIAN'S sacking and spoiling all the rest of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches, (although they had left the most part of their cariage behind them in the citie of DAMAS, to come lighter to the battel) but yet referred for himfelfeall king Darius tent, which was full of great number of officers, of rich moueables, and of gold and filuer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting off his armour, he entred into the bathand fayd: Come on, let vs go and and wash offthe sweate of the battel in Darius owne bath. Nay, replyed one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bath; for the goods of the vanquished are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bath, and saw the basons and eures, the boxes, and violles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chambers perfumedpassing sweetly, that it was like a paradise: then going out of his bath, and coming into histent, feeing it fo stately and large, his bed, the table, and supper, and all ready in such sumptuous fort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and fayd: This was a king indeed, was he not thinke ye . As he was ready to go to his supper, word was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongst other Ladiestaken prisoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmaried who having seene his charrer and bow, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of themselues, thinking Darius had been slaine, Alexander pawsed a good while and gaue no answer, pitying more their missortune, then reioycingathis ownegood hap. Then he presently sent one Leonatus voto them, to let them vnderfland, that Darius was aline, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome onely: and as for them, that they should have at his hands all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his hands. Asthese words pleased the captine Ladies, so the deeds that followed, made them finde his clemency to be no lesse. For first, he suffered them to bury as many of the Persian Lords as they mency to be no lette. For first, ne surrered them to bury as many of the FRSIAN Lotts as they would, cuen of them that had been flaine in the battell, and to take as much filkes of the spoiles, the captive Ladies. iewels, and ornaments, as they thought good to honour their funerals with: and also did lessen no part of their honour, nor of the number of their officers and servants, nor of any iot of their estate which they had before, but did alow them also greater pensions then they had before. Butaboue all, the princeliest grace, and most noble fauour that Alexander shewed vnto these The chasting captine Princesses, which had alwaies lined in honourable fame and chastitie, was this: That of Alexador they neuer heardword, or so much as any suspirion that should make them afraid to be dishonoured or defloured but were privately amongst themselves, vnuisited or repaired vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had been in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had been kept in some close monastery : although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly Prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a king, as I suppose, to conquer himselfe, then to ouercome his enemies, didneither touch them, nor any other maide or wife, before he maried them, Barfine onely excepted, who being left Memnons widow (Generall of king to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would neuer praise him in his presence, having the flatterers, nor yet durst say lesse of the praises which they gaue him. For of the first they were assamed, and by the second they fell in danger.

After supper, he would wash himselfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next day following; and oftentimes all day long. For him felfe, he was nothing curious of daintie dishes: for when any did send him rare fruites, or fish, from the countries neare the sea side, he would send them abroad vnto his friends, & seldome keepe any thing for himself. His table not with standing was alwaies very honourably ferued, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his conquests, rill ircame to the summe of ten thousand drachmaes a day. But there he stayed, and would not exceede that fumme: and moreover, commanded all menthat would feast him, that they should not spend about that summe. After this battel of Is svs, he sent vnto the city of DAMAS, to take all the gold and filuer, the carriage, & all the women and children of the Persians which were by deniding Satyros into two, and then it is sat Tupes which fignifieth, the city of TYRE shall be thine. And they doyet shew vnto this day, the fountaine where Alexander thought he saw the his tutor Lysimachus behind him, (who was fo wearie that he could go no further) but because it was darke night, and for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encourage his tutor, and in manner to carie him. By this meanes vnawares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreouer, it was verie cold, and the way was very ill. At the length, perceiuing divers fires which the enemies that they ranne their way as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and set vpon him, heffue them every man, and so lay there that night, himselfe and his men without danger.

Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the fiege of Tyre, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most part of his armieto take rest, being ouerharried and wearied with so many battels as they had fought: and sent a few of his men onely to give assault vnto the citie, to keepe the Tyrians occupied, that they should take no rest. One day the Soothsayer Ariflander facrificing vnto the gods, having confidered of the fignes of the intrailes of the beafts, (peech of

Alexander

Darius by sea) was taken by the citie of DAMAS. She being excellently well learned in the Greeketongue, and of good entertainement (being the daughter of Artabazus, who cameofa kings daughter) Alexander was bold with her by Parmenioes procurement (as Aristobulus wil teth) who intifed him to imbrace the company of fo excellent a woman, and passing faire her fides. Furthermore, beholding the other Persian Ladies befide which were prisoners, what goodly faire women they were, he spake it pleasantly, that the Ladies of Persia made mene eyes foreto behold them. Notwith fanding, preferring the beautie of his continency before their sweete faire faces, he passed by without any sparke of affection towards them, more then if they had been images of from without life. To confirme this; Philoxenus whom he had left his Lieutenant in the low countries upon the sea coast, wrote unto him on a time, that one Theological rus a merchant of TARENTYM, had to fell two goodly yong boyes, maruellous faire: and therefore that he fent vnto him to know his pleasure, if he would buy them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out aloud: O my friends, what villany hath ever Philoxenus feene in me, that he should denife (having nothing to do there) to purchase me such infamy? whereupon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull words, that he should send that vile TARBNTINE merchant Theodorus and his merchandise to the Denill. He sharply punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would buy a young boy called Crobylus (who for beautie bare the onely name in CORINTH) and bring him to him. Another time also, when he heard that Damon and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vider Parmenioes charge, had deflowed two of the fouldiers wives that were strangers, and waged of him, he wrote vnto Parmenia to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter: and if he found them guiltie of the rape, that then he should put them both to death, as bruit beasts borneto destroy mankind. And in that letter he wrote thus of himselfe: For my selfe, said he, I have neither seene, nor defired to see Daries wife: neither have I suffered any speech of her beautie beforeme. Moreouer he said, that hedid vnderstand that he was mortall by these two things: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weaknesse of our nature proceedeth siee pe, and sensually. He was also no greedy-gut, but temperate in eating, as he showed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he fayd vnto the princesse Ada. whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARIA. For when (fortheloue she bare him) she daily fent him fundry delicate dishes of meate, tarts, and marchpaines, and befides the meate it felic, the paftlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: How Leoni. he answered that he could not tell what to do with them, for he had better cookes then those, appointed him by his gouernour Leonydas, to wit: for his dinner, to rife before day, and to march by night; and for his supper, to eate litle at dinner. And my gouernour, sayd he, would oftentimes open the chefts where my bedding and apparrell lay to feeif my mother had purany fine knackes or conceipts among them. Furthermore, he was leffe given to wine, then men would have judged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber then he was, because he sate long at the boord, rather to talke then drinke. For ever when he dranke, he would propound fometedious matter, and yet but when he was at leifure. For having matters to do, there was neither feaft, banker, play marriage, nor any pastime that could stay him; as they had done other Captaines. The which appeareth plainely by the shortnesse of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deeds he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had ley sure, after he was vp in the morning, first of all he would do secrifice to the gods, and then would go to dinner, passing away all the rest of the day, in hunting, writing something, taking vp some quarrell betweene fouldiers, or else in studying. If he went any journey of no hastie businesse, he would exercise himselfe by the way as he went, shooting in his bow, or learning to get vp or out of his charret suddenly as it ranne. Oftentimes also for his pastime he would hunt the foxe, or catch birds, as appeareth in his booke of remembrances of every day. Then when he cameto his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and annoint himfelfe: and would aske his Alexander pantelers and caruers, if his supper were ready. He would euer suppe late, and was very curious to fee, that euerie man at his boord were alike ferued; and would fit long at the table, because he euer loued to talke, as we have told you before, Otherwise he was as noblea prince and gracious to waite vpon, and as pleafant, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelinesse to adorne a prince, sauing that he would be some thing ouer busie in glorying of his owne deeds, much like vnto a bragging fouldier: neither was he contented him-

Alexander had there also another dreame: for he dreamed he saw a Satyre a farre off sporting Alexanders with him, and when he thought to haue come neare to haue taken him, he still escaped from feed with him, and when he thought to naue come neare to naue this, and intreated him, he fell into dreame a. him, with lat the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into gaine at his hands. The Soothfayers being asked what this dreame should fignifie, answered probably, Tyre.

Satyre. Continuing this flege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell upon Alexanders the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being cast away onely because he ionney a memountaine Antiliban, where he was in great danger of being care away onery because he sainst the heard his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, fay boastingly, that he was not inferiour, nor gainst the care his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, fay boastingly, that he was not inferiour, nor gainst the care him to be a support of the care him to older then the Phoenix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horses, and went vp on foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leaue mons.

leftthere, where the men of armes of the Thessalians sped them full well: for therefore did he fend them thither, because he saw that they had fought valiantly at the day of the battell: and so were the rest of his army also well stored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing tasted first of the gold, silver, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by sent do follow the tracke of beafts, euen fo were they greedie to follow after the goods of the Persians. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coast. Thither came the Kings of CYPRVs and PHOENICIA, and deliuered up to him the whole Iland and all PHOENICIA, fauing onely the citie of TYRE. That citie he besieged scuen monethes together by land, with great bulwarkes & Alexander divers engines of batterie, and by fea, with two hundred gallies. During this fiege, Alexander leftogeth dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the citie, and the collection of the citie, and the collection of the cities called him by his name: and there were divers Trrians also that dreamed in like fort, that A- discanders pollotoldthem that he would go vnto Alexander, because he was not pleased with their doings dreame at in the citie. Thereupon they bound his image (which was of a wonderfull bignesse) with great their of chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base, as if he had bene a traitor that would have yeelded himselfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauouring Alexander.

fo plentifull of all things, that he should maintaine all forts of people. Then he commanded ported, that on a time there arose such a tempest in that desert, that blew vp whole hils of sand, hada defire vnto. For, fortune fauouring him in all his attempts, made him constant and re-folure in his determinations: and his noble courage befides, made him inuincible in all things he tooke in hand, infomuch as he did not onely compell his enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that voyage, in ftead of these former dangers spoken of, he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the gods, by the oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certaine for they have beleeved the oracles that were written of him. First of all, the won-derfull water and great showers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the first danger, and did quench their thirst, and moistened the drinesse of the sand, in such fort that there came a sweete fresh ayre from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to shew them the way, and that they wandred vp and downethey could not tell where, there through this wildernesse, he came vnto the temple he sought for: where the prophet or chiefe priest lalured him from the god Hammon, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murtherers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The priest answered him, & bad him take heede he didnot blaspheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe re-hearling that he had spoken, asked him, if the murtherers that had conspired the death of Philip his father were all punished. After that, be asked him touching his kingdome, if he would grant him to be King over all the world. The god answered him by the mouth of his prophet, he should; and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great presents vnto the god, and gaue money largely to the priests and ministers of the temple. This is that the most part of writers do declare, touching Alexanders demand, and the oracles given him. Yet did Alexander himselfe write vnto his mother, that he had secret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his returne into Macedon. Others fay also, that the prophet meaning to falute him in the Greeke tongue, to welcome him the better, would have faid vnto him, O Paidion, as much as deare sonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, because the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an, s, for an, n, in the latter end, faying, o Pai-dios, to wit, O fonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumour straight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his son. It is said also, did affure them that were present, that the city should be taken by the latter end of the moneth.

Euery body laughed to heare him: for that day was the very last day of the moneth. Alexander feeing him amated; as one that could not tel what to fay to it feeking ener to bring those tokens to effect, which the Soothfayers did prognosticate, commanded them that they should not reckon that day the thirtieth day but the feuen and twentieth and immediatly vpon it made the the chiefe city of Syria, there fell a clod of earth vpon his shouldier, out of the which there flew a bird into the aire. The bird lighting vpon one of the engines of his batteric was caught of. When his Gouernour Leonidas faw him, he faid thus vnto him: When thou hast conquered the countrey where these sweetethings grow, then be liberall of thy persume: but now, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to mind at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this fort: We do fend thee plentie of frankensence and myrrhe, because thou shouldest no more be a niggard vnto the gods. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer also, which was thought to be the preciousest thing and the richest that was gotten of all the spoyles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he faw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thing to be put into it. Some faid one thing, fome faid another thing: but he faid, he would put the Iliads of Homer into it, as the worthieft thing. This is confirmed by the best Historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides words, be true, then it appeareth that he did profite himselse much by Homer in this iourney. For it is reported that when he had conquered ÆGYPT, he determined to build a great citie, and to replenish it with a great number of GRECIANS, and to call itafter his name. But as he was about to inclose a certaine ground, which he had chosen by the aduice of his enginers and worke-mafters, the night before he had a maruellous dreame, that he fawan

And indeed it came fo to passe. When he sent great presents of spoyles which he wanne at the facke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and divers others of his friends: among other things, he fent vnto Leonidus his Gouernour, fiue hundred talents weight of frankensence, and a hundred talents weight of myrrher remembring the hope he put him into when he was a child. For, as Alexander was vpon a day facrificing vntothe gods, he tooke both his hands full of frankensence to east into the fire, to make a perfume there-towards him faidthese verses:

Against the shore of Agypt, which of ancient Pharos hight. As soone as he arose y next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROs, the which at that time was a litle aboue the mouth of the riuer of Nilus, called Canobia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme land, being forced by mans hand. This he thought the meetest place that could be, to build the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great barre of earth, broad inough, that separateth a great lake on the one side, & the sea on the other, the which doth ioyne hard to a great hauen. Then he faid that Homer was wonderful in all his things, but that among it others, he was an excellent Architector: and commanded that straight they should cast the platforme of the citie, according to the fituation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalke, nor white earth there to mark withal, wherfore they were driue to take meale, & with that did mark out vpon the earth being blacke the compaffe of the town that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equall parts, either of them refembled the skirts and fashion of the MACE. DONIAN cloake. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there arose vpon the sodaine out of the river or lake, such an infinite multitude of great fowle of all forts, that they covered the element as it had bene a cloud, and lighting within this circuit, did eat vpall the meale, and left not a crumme. Alexander liked nor these signes. Notwithstanding, his Soothsayer bad him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should build a citic there, them, varo whom he had given the charge of the building, that they should go forward with their worke, and he himselse in the meane time, tooke his sourney to go visite the temple of Inpiter Hammon. The iourney was long, and there were many troubles by the way, but two iourney was dangers about all the rest most speciall; the first was lacke of water, because they had to trauell to the oramany dayes iourney through a great descrithe second was, the danger of the rising of the South wind by the way, to blow the fand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is re-

which flue fifeie thousand men of Cambyses armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know Cambyses these dangers very well: howbeit it was hard to disswade Alexander from any thing which he army sains wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the crowes, they brought them der min againe into the right way which had lost their way. Thus Alexander in the end, having passed iourney.

that he heard Pfammon the Philosopher in Agrer, and that he liked his words very well, when The faying he faid that God was King of all mortall men. For (quothhe) he that commandeth all things, of planmon must needs be God. But Alexander selfe spake better, and like a Philosopher, when he said: the Philosopher that God generally was father to al mortal men, but that particularly he did elect the best fort for providence himselfe. To conclude, he shewed himselfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made of God.

as though he certainly beleeved that he had bin begotten of some god; but vnto the GRECIANS Alexander he spakemore modestly, of divine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS aferibeth touching the city of SAMOs, he faid: I gaue you not that noble free city, but it was given you at God-head

No fuch as from th' immortall gods doth flow. And one day also in a maruellous great thunder, when every man was afraid, Anaxarchus the Rhetoritian being present, said vnto him: O thou sonne of Iupiter, wilt thou do as much: No, said that time by him, whom they called my Lord and father: meaning Philip. Afterwards also being striken with an arrow, &feeling great paine of it: My friends, said he, This bloud which is spilt, he, laughing on him, I will not be so fearefull to my friends, as thou wouldst have metdisdaining the service of fish to my boord, because thou seeft not princes heads served in And y report goeth alfo, that Alexander vpon a time, fending a litle fifth vnto Hephaftion, Anaxarchus thould favas it were in mockeric, that they which about others seeke for fame with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or else as sittle as others haue. By these proofes & reasons alleaged, we may thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of himselfe, to think that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to keep other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceived of his godhead. Returning out of PHOENICIA Alexander into AGYPT, he made many facrifices, fealts, and processions in honour of the gods, sundrie male feafs dances, tragedies, and fuch like pastimes, goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which striued cuery one to exceed the other. For the kings of the Cyprians were the fetters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defray the charges of these pastimes. These kings were very earnest who should do best, but specially Nicocreon, king of Sa-LAMINA, in CYPRY s: and Paficrates, Lord of the city of Sol Bs. For it febout to their lot to firnishtwo of the excellentest players; Pasicrates furnished Athenodorus, and Ricocreon Thessalus, whom Alexander loued fingularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victour, by the Judges deputed to give sentence. For when he went from the playes, he told them he did like the Judges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would have bene contented to have given the one halfe of his Realme, not to have seene Thessalus overcome. theredorus being condemned vponatime by the ATHENIANS, because he was not in ATHENS at the feast of Bacchus, when the Comedies & Tragedies were plaied, and a fine set on his head for his absence:he befought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would release his penaltie. Alexander would not so do, but sent thither his money, whereof he was condemned, and payed it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycon Scarphian, an excellent sageplayer had pleased Alexander well, and did foist in a verse in his comedie, containing a petition of ten talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him. Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certaine of his friends allo, to pray him to take ten thousand talents for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his hands, and for all the countries, lands and figniories on this side the river of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in mariage, that from thenceforth he might be his kinseman and friend. Alexander imparted this to his councell. Among them Parmenin faid vnto him: If I were Alexander, quoth he, furely I would accept his offer. So would I indeed quoth Alexander again, if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would fubmir himself, he would vie him curteously if not, that then he wold presently march towards him. But he repented him afterwards, when king Darius wife was dead with child: for without diffimulation it grieued him much, that he had loft fo noblean occasion to shew his curtesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her body honourable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongst the Eunuches of the Queenes chamber, there was one Tireus taken prisoner, among the women:who stealing out of Alexanders camp, taking his horse-backe, rode vnto Darius to bring travell of him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, and weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O gods, what wretched hap haue the PERSIANS! that haue not only had the wife and fifter of their king taken prisoners even in his life time, but now that she is dead intravel of child, the hath bene depriued of princely burial. Then spake the cunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, and for all due honor that might be wished her, PERSTA hath no causeto complaine of her hard fortune. For neither did Queene Statira your wife whilst she lined prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any part or iot of their honor they were wont to have before, fauing onely to fee the light of your honour, the which, god oromafdes grant to restore buriall. again(ifit be his will)vnto your Maiestie:neither was there any honor wanting at her death(to fet forth her stately funerals) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies. For Alexander is as merciful in victory as he is valiant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in mind for very griefe, tooke the Eunuchaside into the se-Darissialle Cretest place of his tent, and faid vnto him: If thou be not, with the misfortune of the P_{ERSTAN} , with trees become a Macedonian, but doest in thy heart acknowledge Darius for thy sourcingne Lord and master: I pray thee, and do also coniure thee, by the reuerence thou bearest vnto this bright light of the Sunne, and to the right hand of the King, that thou do tell me truly.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT.

Arethefe the least euils which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death. And did she not inher lifemakevs more nuiferable by her dishonor, then if we had dishonorably fallen into the hands of acruell enemy. For, what honest communication, I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a prifoner hauing done her fo much honour as he had done Darius going on with these speeches, Tireus the cunuch fell downe on his knees, and befought himnor to fay fo, neither to blemish the vertue of Alexander in that fort, nor yet fo to dishonour his fifter and wife deceaffed, & thereby alfoto depriue himfelf of the greatest comfort he could wish to haue in his calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemy that had greater vertues then a man could possibly haue; but rather that he should wonder at Alexanders vertue, who had shewed himself chaster to the Ladies, then valiant against the Persians, And therewithall, the cunuch confirmed the great honestie, chastitie and noble mind of Alexander, by many great and The comdeepe oathes. Then Darius coming out among his friends againe, holding vp his hands vnto of diesands the heavens, made this prayer vnto the gods: O heavenly gods, creators of men, and protectors desidafia of Kings and Realmes. first, I beseech you grant me, that restoring the Persians againeto their in. former good estate, I may leaue the Realme vnto my successors, with that glorie & fame I receiuedit of my predecessors: that obtaining victorie, Imay vse Alexander with that great honor and courtefie, which he hath in my mifery shewed vnto those I loued best in the world. Or otherwise if the time appointed be come, that the kingdome of Persia must needes have end, either thorough divine revenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: then good gods yet grant; that none but Alexander after me, may sit in Cyrus throne. Divers writers do agree, that these things came euen thus to passe. Now Alexander having conquered all As 1 A on this side of the river ? Euphrates, he went to meet with Darins, that came downe with ten hundred thousand fighting prayer ramen. It was told him by fome of his friends to make him laugh, that the flaues of his armie had deuided themselues in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall of either part, naming the one Daring aracuacentremerues intwo parts, and hat arthe first, they began to skirmish only with clods of miest the alexander, and the other Darius; and that arthe first, they began to skirmish only with clods of hundred earth, and afterwards with fifts; but at the last, they grew so hor, that they came to plaine stones shouland and flaues, for that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes have the two fighing and flaues, for that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes have the two fighing and flaues, for that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needes have the two fighing and flaues, for that they could not be parted. Alexander felfdid arme him that was cal

The fight was sharpe betweene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priviledge to goafter the Per sian manner. Thus it is written by Eratosthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gausameles, which fignifieth in the Persian tongue, the house of the Cammell. For some one of the ancient kings of PERSIA that had escaped from the hands of his enemies, flying vpon a dromedarie cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villagesto keepe the cammel there. There fel out at that time an eclipse of the Moone, in the moneth called Bodromion(now August) about the time that the feasts of the mysteries were celebrated at A-THENS. The eleuenth night after that, both the armies being in fight each of other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went himselfe by torch-light viewing his bands & companies. Alexander on the other fide whilest his MACBDONIAN fouldiers slept, was before his tent with Ariflander the Soothsayer, and made certaine secret ceremonies and sacrifices vnto Apollo. The ancient captaines of the Macedonians, specially Parmenio, seeing all the valley betwixt the river of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIEIANS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadfull noise as of a confused multitude of people that filled their campe with the found thereof: they were amazed, and confulted, that in one day it was in maner unpossible to fight a battell with such an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counsell him to give battell by night, because the darkenesse thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the fight of their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable answer: I will not stealevictoric, quoth he. This answer seemed very fond and arrogant to some, that The maghe was so pleasant, being neare so great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present manimite noble courage, and a deepe confideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby of Alexanto give Darius no manner of occasion (if he were overcome) to take heart againe, and to prove for a fine, and to give his sonne in hostage: and they onely lest him for pities sake, the kingdome of Macedon, with all the appertenances. And there he daily putting to death the chiefest of his Nobilitie, and nearest of bloud vnto him, he filled his realme with crueltie and mortall hate against him. Furthermore amongst such a heape of euils, having but one onely ioy, to have a vertuous sonne, he put him to death, for spite and malice that he saw the Romaines honour him, and left his other sonne Perfeus successor of his realme; who, as it is reported, was not his lawfull begotten sonne, but taken for his sonne, and borne of a tailors wife called Gnathenium: It is that Perseus, whom Paulus Amylius ouercame, and led in triumph in Rom n; and at him the race of the kings descended from Antigonus, failed; where the iffue and offpring of Aratuscontinueth yet untill our time, in the cities of Sicyone, and Pallena.

AEmylius faying if fouldiers.

Phicrates the ATHENIAN captaine faid, that a mercenary foldier should be couctous, a louer, and voluptuous: that to get wherewith to maintaine his pleasure, he should be the valianter, and readier to put himself into any danger. But most men thinke, that souldiers should be as one entire strong body, that stirreth not of it self without y moning of the Generall. And to approve this opinion, it is said that Paulus Amylius arriving in MACEDON, and finding the fouldiers full of words and curiofity (euery man medling with the affaires of the Generall) he made open proclamation, No man so hardie to meddle with his office & affaires; but every man only to keep his fword sharp, & to be quick of hand against the enemy; and for the rest, to refer al to him, who wold take sufficient order for things of his charge & gouernment. Therfore Plato faith, that it litle quaileth to haue a good and wife Captaine, if the fouldiers also be not wise and obedient; thinking it as requisite for the vertue of obedience, to hauemen of a noble mind and good education, as otherwise it is meete for a Captaine to know how todirect and command well; confidering it is that which with lenitie and mildnesse doth mitigate all fury & choler. He hath diuers other examples & sufficient proofes to proue his words true; and namely, the great miseries & calamities which came to the Romain's after y death of Nero, do plainly shew, that nothing is more dangerous nor dreadfull in an Empire, the a great army living licentiously & disorderly. For Demades after the death of Alexader the great, compared Alexandersarmy vnto Cyclops Polyphemus after his eye was put out:confidering how blindly & loofly they were gouerned. How beit the Empire of Rome being deuided into fundrie factions at one felftime and rifing against it felf in many places, it fel into the like mistortunes & calamities fained by the Poets of the TITANS: not fo much through the ambitious nesses of the Emperors, as The Empire by meanes of the conetoufnetie and infolency of the foldiers, who drane the Emperors out of whereas their Imperial seates one after another, as one naile driueth out another. And Dionysius also the likened. want of Sicile, was wont to call Phareus (who had bin tyrant of Thessalia onely ten moneths space) a tyrant in a play, deriding his so sudden change of state. But the Imperial house of the Cafars at Rome, receiued foure Emperors, in lesse then ten moneths space, the soldiers now putting in one, and then taking out another, as if they had bene in a play on a scaffold. So that the ROMAINES being thus grieuoully oppressed, had yet this comfort that they needed not to seeke tobercuenged of them that did oppressethem. For they saw one of them murther another, and him first and most justly of all other murthered, that had first of all corrupted the soldiers, in teaching them to make gaine of the change of the Emperors; and fo deprauing a worthy deed of iselfe, which was their for saking of Nerorand mingling it with briberie, made it plaine treason. For Nymphidius Sabinus, being Captaine of the Emperors guard, which are called the Prato- sabine, and rian foldiers, together with Tigellinus, when he faw Nero in despaire of himselfe and of his e- Tigellinus, fate, and that he was ready to flie into AGYPT: he perswaded the guard they should call Galba Nero. Emperor, as if Nero had not bene at Rome, but fled and gone; and promifed enery one feuen thousand fine hundred Drachmaes apeece; and to the rest of the souldiers that were dispersed vpand downe in garrison vpon the provinces, twelue hundred and fiftie Druchmaes a man. For the leavying of which fumme, they could not possibly do it, but they must needs comit tenthoufand times more extortion on enery body, then Nero had done. This large promife made them presently put Nero to death, and shortly after him, Galba himselfealso. For the soldiers for soke Nero, for the hope they had to receive this promifed gift: and shortly after they slue the second, which was Galba, because they received not their gifts in time to their contentment. Afterwards also, in seeking who should still feed them with like gifts, before they could obtaine gifts deterwards alto, in tecking who should still reed them with like girts, perfore they could obtain their wished hope, one of the destroyed another by treason and rebellion. But now to set down Empire of all things particularly which hapned at that time, it were to write one whole entire historie; and Reme. therefore, I will content my selfe, not to passe ouer with silence the notablest deeds, and lamentable calamities, which happened at that time vnto the Cafars. Itis manifestly known to all men, that Sulpitius Galba of a private man, was the richest & wealthiest that came to be in the number of the Casurs: who, though he came of a very noble house, and wolffderining himselfe from the race & family of the Sernij; yet he was honored the more, because he peop Gal-, was akin vnto Quintus Catulus, who for vertue & estimation, was one of the chiefest men of his time, albeit that otherwise he willingly refigned his authority and power vnto others. So Galba thereby was somewhat akin vnto Livia the wife of Angustus Casar, and therefore for her sake he came out of the Emperors pallace, whe he went to take possession of his Consulship. Moreouer itis reported, that whe he had charge of the army in GERMANY, he did valiatly behaue himself. And in the government of LIBIA also, where he was Vice-confull, he did as honorably behave himselfe, as any man whatsoeuer. Howbeit his meane and simple ordinary of diet, voide of all Galbaei excesse, was reputed misery and niggardlinesse in him, when he was proclaimed Emperor: betause the practise of sober and temperate diet which he would have brought in vie, was then so raw athing that it was taken for a new & strange deuice. He was sent gouernor also into Spaine by Nero, before he had learned to be afraid of the citizens of great authority: howbeit, besides that he was of a courteous & gentle nature, his age moreouer increased the opinion they had of Galbaer him, that he was timerous and feareful. For when the wretched officers of Nero did cruelly vexe contests. and torment the provinces, and that it lay not in Galba any way to helpe them: yet was it some cofortto them, which were judged & fold as flaues by the officers, to fee that Galba did lamet the miseries & calamities they endured, as if they had bindone vnto himself. So whe any sladerous times were made against Nero, which were long vp & downe in euery place, he would neither forbid the, nor yet was offended as Neroes officers were. Therefore he was maruelloufly beloled in the countrey, of them that were acquainted with him: because he was then in the eight yeare of his gouernment as Procoful among ft the, at which time Iunius Vindex being Proprietor Iunius Vindex being Proprietor of GAVLE, rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred des rebelled against Nero, who as it is reported, had written vnto Galba, before he entred into open action of rebellion. But Galba did neither beleeue him, nor also accuse & bewray him, led ag as diverfe others which were governors of armies and provinces did: who fent Vindex letters vnto Nero which he himselfe had written vnto them, and so did as much as in them lay to him. der the enterprise, who afterwards being of the cospiracy did confesse they were traitors to the felues, as much as vnto him. Howbeit when Vindex afterwards had proclaimed ope war against Nero, he wrote againe vnto Galba, and praied him to take the Imperiall crowne vpon him, and to become the head of a strong and mightie bodie (which were the GAVLES) that lacked no. thing but a head & gouernor, being a hundred thousand fighting me ready armed, & mightalso leavie a great number more of them. Then Galba consulted therupon with his friends, & among them some were of opinion that he should stay a while, to see what change and alteration would grow at Rome vpon this stirre. Howbeit Titus Iunius, Captaine of the Prætorian band, said vn to him: O Galba, what meaneth this fo doubtfull a deliberation? Be not we wife men, to call in question whether we shal allow of Vindex friendship; or accuse him; yea, & with armes persecute him, that defired rather to have thee Emperor, then Nero tyrant over the state of Rome? Afterwards Galba by bils fet vp eucry where, appointed a day certaine, to enfranchize fuch as would make fuite for it. This rumor flying straight abroad, he gathered a great number of soldiers toge. ther, that were very willing to rebel: and he was no fooner gotten vp into the tribunall or chaire of stare, but all the souldiers did salute him by the name of Emperor. Howbeit he was not cotent with this name at the first, but accusing Nero, & lamenting the death of the noblest men whom he had cruelly put to death, he promifed that he would employ his best wit and discretion to the feruice and benefit of his countrey, neither naming himfelfe Cafar, nor Emperor, but only Lieutenant to the Senate, & state of Rome. Now, that Vindex did wifely to cal Galba to be Emperor. Nero himself in his doings doth witnesse it: who having alwayes made a countenance as though he passed not for Vindex, & that he weighed not the rebellion of the GAVLES: when it was told him that Galba was called Emperour, being then at supper, for spite he ouerthrew thetable. Moreover, though § Senate had indged Galbs an enemy, yet Nero to be pleafant with his friends. made as though he was nothing afraid of it, & faid, This news made al for him, because he flood in need of mony, & alfo that it was a happy occasion offered him to helpe him withall. For faid he, we shall soone have all the GAVLES goods, as the spoile of a just warre, after we have once againe ouercome & conquered them: and moreouer, Galbaes goods also would quickly be inhis hands, that he might fel them, confidering that he was become his open enemy. So he presently commanded Galbaes goods should be openly fold, to them that would give most. Galba understanding that, did also by found of trumper sell all Nerves goods he had in all the province of Spain fr. and did also find more men readier to buy, the there were goods to sel. Daily men rose against Nero in eucry country, who tooke Galbaes part, Clodius Macer only excepted in Africk, and Verginius Rufus in GAVLE, both of them having charge of legios appointed for the fafekeeping of German y; and both of them did follow feuerall directions by themselves, varying in mind & intent. For Clodius Macer having robbed much, & put divers men also to death through his crueltie and couetousnesses, shewed plainly, that he swam betweene two waters, as one that could neither let go his charge, not yet keepe it. Verginius also on the other side, being generall oner great & mightie legions, who had fundry times called him Emperor, and did in maner force him to take vpon him the name & Empire: he notwithstanding did euer answerthem, that he neither minded to take v Empire vpon him, nor yet to fuffer any other to do it, then fuch as the Senate should chuse & cal vnto the same. This at the first somewhat amazed Galba. But whe both the armies of Vindex & Verginius, in spite of their Captaines (who could not stay nor keep them backe, no more then coach-men can keepe backe the horse with their bridles) were joyned in a great battell together, where were flain 20000 GAVLES in the field & Vindex also flue himself Thortly after it was given out, that the conquerors after to great a victory obtained, would copel Verginius to take vpon him to be Emperor, or else that they would take Nerges part again. Then Galbabeing not a litle perplexed, wrote vnto Verginius, & perfwaded him to ioyne with himto hold vp the Empire & liberty of the ROMAINS, and therupon fled straight into a city of SPAINE called Colonia, rather repenting him of that he had done, & wishing for his wonted peaceable and quiet life wherein he was brought vp, the otherwise occupying himselfabout any necesfary or profitable thing for the furtherance of his enterprise. Now it was about the beginning of fommer, & one day towards euening, there came to Galba one of his flaues enfráchised, a Sici-LIAN born, that was come from Rom B in feuen daies: who vnderstanding that Galba was alone, went prefently to his chamber dore, and opened it, and coming in against the wils of the grooms of the chamber, that stood at the dore, he told him, that Nero being yet aliue, but seene no more, first the people of Rom B, and then the Senate had proclaimed him Emperor, & that immediatly after, newes came that Nero was dead: the which he hardly beleeuing notwithstanding, went thither himself, saw his body laid out vpon y ground, and then made towards him with all speed to bring him thefe newes. The newes maruelloufly reviued Galba, & a multitude of menthronged straight about the dore, which began to be couragious, seeing him lively again, although the speed of the messenger seemed incredible. Howbeit two daies after, Titus also arrived, with certaine others of the camp, who told Galba particularly what the Senate had decreed in his behalf. So this Titus was called to great honor: and the flaue enfranchifed had priviledge given him to weare rings of gold, & he was called Martianus Vicellus, who afterwards of all the enfranchifed bondmen, became the chiefest man about his master Galba. In the meane time, Nymphidius SA-BINE began at Rom E, not couertly, but with open force, to take vpon him the absolute gouern- w Sabine ment of the Empire, perswading himselfe that Galba was so old, that he could hardly be brought taken poor in a litter vnto Rome, being at the least 73 yeares old: besides also, that the army of § Pr Aro-RIANS which were in Rome, did beare him good wil of long time, & then acknowledged none other Lord but him only, for the large promise he had made the, for the which he received the thanks, and Galba remained the debter. So he prefently comanded Tigellings, his companion and Captaine with him of the army of the PRETORIANS, to leave off his sword and disposing himselfeto banqueting and feasting he sent for all those that hadbin Consuls, Prætors or Procosuls of provinces, & made them all to be invited in the name of Galba. So, there were certain foldiers gaue out this rumor in the campe, that they should do well to fend Ambassadors vnto Galba. to pray him that Nymphidius might be their only Captaine stil, without any copanion joyned with him. Furthermore, the honor & good wil the Senate bare him, calling Nymphidius their benefactor, & going daily to vifit him in his house, procuring him to be the author of al their decrees to Nymbipassed in Senate, & that he should authorise the this made him high minded, and the bolder by much; in fo much that fhortly after, they that came to honor him in this fort, did not only hate & made him milike his doings, but moreouer he made the afraid of him. Furthermore, whethe Confuls had grow too bild and ingiuen to common pursiuants any commissions vnder seale, or letters patents signifying the decrees of the Senate, to eary them to the Emperor (by vertue of which letters patents, when the officers of the citie do fee the feale, they straight provide the pursuants of coaches and fresh horses to further their speed and hastie iourney:) Nymphidius was very angrie with the, because they did not also come to him for his letters, sealed by him & his soldiers, to send likewise to the Emperor. But besides all this, it is also reported that he was like to have deposed the Consuls: howbeit they excusing themselues vnto him, and crauing pardon, did appease his anger. And to please the commons also, he suffered them to put any of Neroes friends to death they could Neroes meete withall. Among other, they flue a fencer called Spicillus, whom they put vnder No- friends roes statues, which they dragged up and downe the citie. Another also called Aponius, one of Ne. Jaine at roesaccusers, they threw him to the ground, & draue carts over him loden with stones. And di-Nymph dius uerseothers also, whom they slue in that maner, of the which some had done no maner of of-commandefence. Hereupon one Maurifeus, one of the noblest men of the citie, and so esteemed, said openly in the Senate: I feare me we shall wish for Nero againe, before it belong. So Nymphidius being come in maner to the fulnesse of his hope, he was very glad to heare that some repined at The baren, him, because he was the sonne of Caius Casar, that was the next Emperor after Tiberius. For this tage of Caius Casar, when he was a yong man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had bin a faine yong "Mymphidius" mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been not been a faine young man, had kept Nymphidius mother, which had been not be woman, and the daughter of one Calliftus, one of Cafars enfranchised bondmen, whom he had gotten of a laundreffe he kept. Howbeit it is found contrary, that this Nymphidius was borne before Cains Cafar could know his mother: and men thought that he was begotten of a fencer called Martianus, with whom his mother Nymphidia fell in fancie, for that he had a great name at that time in Rome: and indeed Nymphidius was liker to him in fauor, then vnto any other. So, he cofessed that he was the son of this Nymphidia, howbeit he did ascribe the glory of the death of Nero vnto himself, & thought himself not sufficiently recopenced with the honors they gaue him, neither also with the goods he enjoyed, neither for that he lay with Sporus who Nero loued fo dearly, whom he fent for to Neroes funerals whilest his body was yet a burning, and kept him with him as if he had bene his wife, and called him Poppeus. Furthermore, all this did not content him, but yet fecretly he aspired to be Emperor, partly practifing the matter in Rome it selfe, by the meanes of certaine women and Senators which were feeretly his friends: and partly allo through one Gellianes, whom he fent into Spaine, to fee how all things went there. Howbeit after the death of Nero, all things prospered with Galba, saving Verginius Rusus only, who stood doubtful yer, & made him forely mistrust him for that he was afraid (besides that he was Generall over a great and puiffant army, having also newly overthrown Vindex, & secretly ruling the best pare of the Empire of Rome, which was all GAVLE, and then in tumult & vprore, ready to rebell, left he would hearken vnto them that perfwaded him to take the Empire to himfelf. For Problems there was no Captaine of Rome atthat time to famous, and of to great estimation as Verginius: and that describedly, for that he had done great service to the Empire of Rome in time of extreunivie, having delivered Rome at one felfe time from a cruell tyrannie, and also from the danger of the warres of the GAVLES. This notwith flanding Verginius perfifting fill in his first determinetion, referred the election of the Emperous vnto the Senate although, that after the death of New was openly knowne, the common fort of foldiers were carneftly in hand with him, and char a Tribune of the foldiers (otherwise called a Colonell of athousand men) went into his tent with a fword drawnein his hand, and bad Verginius either determine to be Emperor, or else to look to have the fwordthrust into him. Yet after that Fabius Valens, Captaine of a legion, was Tworne vnto Galba, & that he had received letters from Rome, advertifing him of the ordinance and decree of the Senate; in the end, with much ado, he perswaded the souldiers to proclaime Galba Emperor, who fent Flaceus Ordeonius to fucceed him, vnto whom he willingly gaue place. So, when verginius had delinered up his army unto him, he went to meet with Galba, on whom he waited, coming on still towards Rome. And Galba all that time neither shewed him cuill countenance, nor yet greatly effected of him, Galba himfelfe being cause of the one who seared then, and his friends of the other, but fpecially Titus Iunius: who for the malice he bare vnto Verginius thinking to hinder his rifing, did vnwittingly indeed further his good hap, and delinered him occasion to draw him out of the civill warres and mischiefs (the which lighted afterwards vpon all the other Captaines) and to bring him to a quiet and peaceable life in his age. Furthermore, Ambassadors were sent fro the Senate, & met with Galba at NARBONA, a city of GAVLE: where after they had presented their humble duty, they perswaded him to make all the hast he could possible to shew himselfe to the people of Rome, who were maruellously desirous to see him. Galba received them very graciously and courteously, and made them great cheare, howbeit very modestly. For notwithstanding that Nymphidius had sent him diuerse officers, and flore of Nerves moueables: yet he would never be ferued with any of them, at any feafts or banquets he made, nor with other then his owne stuffe; wherein he shewed his noble mind, and how he could mafter all vanity. But Titus Iunius shortly aftertold Galba, that this noble mind,& civill moderation, without pride or pompe, was too lowly a manner to flatter the people, and that it was a certaine respect of honesty that knew not it selfe, and became not his greatnesse and maieftie. So, he perswaded him to vie Neroes money and stuffe, and to be sumptuous & Princely in his feasts, without niggardlinesse. To conclude, the old man Galba began plainly to shew, that he would be ruled by Titus Innius: who aboue all other was extreme couctous, and besides too much given to women. For when he was a yong man, the first time he went to the warres vuder Caluisus Sabine, he brought his Captaines wife (which liked good fellowship) disguised likea fouldier into the campe, into his Generals tent (which the Romains called Principia) and there was somewhat bold with her. Wherfore Cains Casar committed him to prison, but he escaped at his death. Another time, whe he supped with Clodins Cafar, he stole a silver pot. Clodins hearing of it, bade him againe to supper the next night: but he commanded his menthey should giue him drinke in a earthen cruse. Thus this thest (through Casars pleasantnesse) seemed rather a matter of sport, then of anger: howbeit the faults which he committed afterwards through extreme couetousnesse of money (at what time he ruled Galba, and bare all the sway about him) gaue vnto some iust cause, and vnto others apparent colour of tragicall mischieses, and grieuous calamities. For Nymphidius, 10 foone as Gellianus was returned out of SPAINE, whom he had fent thither to fee what Galba did, informing him that Cornelius Lacon was Captaine of the guard and house of the Emperor; and that Titus Iunius did all in all about him, and that he could never be suffered to come neare Galba, nor to speake with him apart, because those which were about Galba did mistrust him, and cuer had an eye to him to see what he did; he was maruellously perplexed perplexed withall. Thereupon he called for all the Centurions, Captaines, and pettie Captaines of the campe of the Prætorian armic, and perswaded them that Galba touching his owne person, was a good old and discreet man, howbeit that he did not follow his own eaduice and counsel. but was ruled altogether by Iunius & Lacon, who marred all: and therefore, that it were good (beforethey came to be of greater power, and to have fuch great authoritie in managing the affaires of the Empire, as Tigellinus had before) to fend Ambassadors to the Emperor, in the name of all the campe, to tell him that in putting those two men from about him, he should be the better welcome to Rome, and to all men else besides. The Captaines vtterly misliked this device. For they thought it too strange, and beyond all reason, to seeme to teach an old Emperour, as if he were but a child that did not know what it was to gouerne: and to appoint him what fernants and friends he should keepe, & whom he should trust or mistrust. Nymphydius perceiuing this. tooke another course, and wrote letters vnto Galbato terrific him; one time sending him word that he was maruellous euill beloued of many in Rome, and that they were readie to rebell against him: another time also that the legions of GERMANIB were revolted, and that he vnderflood the like from the legions of Ivris and Syria and another time also that Clodius Macer in Africk E stayed all the ships fraughted with corne that were bound for Rome. But in the end finding that Galba made no account of him, and that he gaue no credit to his words nor writings, hedetermined first of al to set vpon him. Howbeit Clodius Celsus, born in the city of Antioch, awise man, and his faithful friend, disswaded him maruellously notto do it; declaring vnto him, that he thought there was no one house nor family in Rom E that would call Nymphidius, C. efar. Howbeit in contrary manner, divers others mocked Galba, and specially one Mithridates of the Realme of Pont, that faid he was abald writhen man. For the Romain's (faid he) have him indeed now in some estimation: but when they have once seene him, they wil think it a perpetual! flame and reproch to our time, that he was called Cafar. So they thought it good to bring Nymphidius about midnight into the camp, & there openly to proclaime him Emperor. How beit the chiefe Tribune of the fouldiers called Antonius Honoratus, gathered his fouldiers together in the Honoratus, night, and before them all did first openly reproue himselfe, and then them, for that they had so often turned and changed in fo short time, without any wit or discretion, having no indgement the joulus, who to chuse the best way, but to be pricked forward & caried headlong in that fort by some wicked spirit, which brought the out of one treason into another. And yet (faid he) our first change had fome countenance of reason, to wit, the horrible vices and faults of Nero: but now whereincan we accuse Galba, to have any countenance to falsisse our faith vnto him? hath he slaine his mothere hath he put her to death? hath he shamefully played the tumbler or common player young scaffold in y Theater. And yet for all these vile parts, we neuer durst once begin to for sake nero, but gaue credit to Nymphidius words, who told vs that Nero had first forsaken vs, and that he was fled into AGYPT. What shall we do? shall we kill Galba after Nero: what shall we kil him that is a kin vnto Liuia, to make the fonne of Nymphidia Emperor, as we haue already flaine the fonne of Agrippina? or shall we rather kill him that hath rashly entred into this enterprise, and thereby to renenge the death of Nero, and to shew our selues faithfull fouldiers ynto Galba: All the souldiers yeelded straight to the Colonels words, and therewith went to their other companions to periwade them to keepe their faith and promife they anowed vnto the Emperor: fo that they made many of them reuolt againe from Nymphidius. Thereupon the noile and cries being great, Nymphidius sapposing (as some thought) that the souldiers did call for him, or else hoping betimes to quench this tumult, to flay fuch as were yet wauering : he went thither himselfe with great store us apprete of torch light, and carried an oration in his hand, the which Ciconius Varro had made for him, and 10 be Em the which he had learned without book to speake vnto the foldiers. But when he found the gates of the campe shut, and saw divers men armed vpon the wals, he began to be afraid: and coming nearer, asked them what they meant by it, and by whose commandement they had armed themfelues as they did. Answer was made him by them all, that they acknowledged no other Empe-Tor but Galba: the which he seemed to like of, and also commanded them that followed him to do the like, & therewithall drew nearer. Whereupon certain of the fouldiers that warded at the gate, did open him the gate, and fuffered him to come in with a few men with him. Howbeit as foone as he was come in first there was a dart throwne at him, the which one Septimius that went before him received upon his shield and then others also came with their swords drawn in their Nymphidihands to fet vpon him, and followed him as he fled into a fouldiers cabine, where they flue him.

Then they layed his bodie in an open place, & railed it about, that every man that would, might the next day fee it. So Nymphidius being flain in this fort, Galba vnderstanding of his death, commanded that all Nymphidius friends and confederators that had not bin flain at that time, should

for his fake be put to death, as indeed they were. Amongst the they slue Ciconius that had made the oration for Nymphidius, and Muhridates also of Pont. Howbeit, though indeed they had deferued it, yet menthought it a very cruell part to command these mento be put to death in that fort, which were men of such qualitie and calling as they were, without due forme and order of law. For enery man flood in good hope vpon the coming in of this new Emperour, to have feene another manner of gouernment then they had yet feene: howbeit they were deceived of their hope at the first chop. But yet they misliked this most of all, when he commanded them to kill Petronius Tertullianus, that had bene Confull, because he was Neroes faithfull friend. But now for the death of Clodius Macer, whom Trebonianus flue in AFRICKE by his commandement, and for Fonteius that was also flaine in GERMANIE by Valens, he had some reason to scare them because they were in armes, & commanded great armies. But for Tertullianus, that was an old man, naked and vnarmed, truly he should have put him to his triall by law, if he would have ministred inflice, the which he promifed to keepe at his first coming to the Imperiall crowne. Hereinthey greatly reproued Galos. Now when he drew neare to Rome within flue & twenty furlongs, he was compassed about with a multitude of mariners & sea-faring men, that kept the high way on euery fide, wandering vp & down in euery place. These were the men whom Nero had gathered together into one legion, and had taken them from the oare and made them fouldiers. So they were come thither to be futers to him, that he would allow them still to be fouldiers; and they prefied to arrogantly vpon him, that they would not fuffer those which came to the new Emperor, to see him nor speake with him, but they sel to tumult & vprore, crying out to have ensignes for their legion, & to be appointed a place to lie in, in garrison. Galba referred them ouer to another sime, & bade them they should then let him understand their demand. They told him againe, that this delay was a kind of deniall, and thercupon fell to plaine mutinie, & followed him with great cries: infomuch that some of them stucke not to draw out their swords. Then Galba commanded the hortemen he had about him, to fet vpon them. So there was not a man of them that refisted, but some of them were ouerthrown, and troden vnder their horse feete, and others also flaine as they fled. This was a very cuill figne and prefage for him, to enter into Roma with fuch bloudshed, vpon so many poore dead mens bodies as lay slaine on the ground. Howbeit, where fome before did despile & mocke him for an old feeble man, euery man then was afraid of him, and quaked for feare. Furthermore, because he would shew a great change and alteration from the vnreasonable vaine gifts & expences of Nero, it seemeth he did many vncomely things. As when one Canus an excellent plaier on y recorder, had plaied all supper time, because it was maruellous sweet musick to heare, he praised and commended it maruellously, and commanded one to bring him his casket, out of the which he took a few crowns, and put them into his hand, fayingsthat it was not mony of the common treasure, but of his owne. Furthermore, hegaue straight commandement that they should require and call backe againe the gifts Nero had given and bestowed vpon common players, minstrels, wrestlers, and people of such kind of facultie and profession, and to leave them onely the tenth part. But he got litle by this device. For the most part of those that had gifts given them, had spent and consumed it all, as men that lived without any rule or order, & spent at night that which they got in the day and besides, they were to hunt after them that had either taken or bought any thing of them, and to make them restore it againe. But this was an endlesse worke: for things had bene so conueyed from man to man, that in the end it came to an infinit number of mens hands. But of all this, the shame and dishonor returned to Galba himself, though the malice and hatred lighted on Titus Iunius: who only made the Emperour straight-laced to all others, whilest he himselfe tooke vnreasonably of all men, making port-fale of euery thing that came to hand. For Hesiodus the Poet saith: As well when the veffell is full that is spill,

As when it is emptie, thir ft craneth drinke ftill. But Iunius perceiuing Galba to be old and feeble, would wisely take his fortune and time while time serued, supposing it almost to be at an end so soone as he began to enter into it. So in the meanetime he did much dishonour the poore old man, ouer-greatly abusing (vnder cloke of his authoritie) the chiefest and weightiest matters, in reprouing, or altogether hindering those,

the which the Prince him self had a good defire to deale verightly in, as to punish the officers of Galbakit-Nero. For he put some of them to death, among the which Elius was one, and certaine other, as leth Neroet Polyclitus, Petinus, and Patrobius: whereat the people maruellously reioyced, and cried out, as officers. they went ro execution through the market place, that it was a goodly and bleffed procession. and required Tigellinns of the gods and men, that had bene chiefe mafter and guide of all Neroes ryrannie. How beit the trim man had gotten the vantage, and had largely fed Innius before: for afterwards he put poore Tertullianus to death, who had neither betrayed nor hated Nero, being ashe was, and had neuer offended, nor was partaker of any of the wicked parts he played when he was aliue. Whereas he that made Nero worthy of death, and that afterwards had also betrayed him, was let alone, and nothing faid vnto him; being a manifest proofe to all others, that they should not doubt to hope to obtaine any thing at Titus Iunius hands, so they fed him witheifts. For the commo people of Rome neuer defired any thing fo much, as to fee Tigellinus to be caried to execution: and they never left crying out to demand him in all affemblies of the Theater or shew place, vntill such time as the Emperor Galba did forbid them by proclamation. the which declared that Tigellinus would not live long, because he was ficke of a consumption of the lungs, which by litle and litle did weare him to nothing; and Galba prayed the people that they would not make his Empire tyrannicall and bloudy. The people were much offended with this, but yet they seemed to laugh at it: & Tigellinus did facrifice to the gods for his health & safety, and prepared a sumptuous feast. Where Iunius rising from supper, being set by the Emperor, went vnto Tigellinus to be merry with him, and tooke his daughter being a widow with him, vnto whom Tigellinus dranke, and offered her a gift of fine & twentie Myriades of filuer: and commanded one of his chiefest concubines to take from her necke a carcanet she wore, being worth ffreene Myriades, and to give it the other. After he had handled the matter thus, those things that were done vprightly and with inftice, were reproued and taken in enill part: as the thing that was granted to the GAVLES, because they did rebell with Vindex. For men thought that they were not discharged of the subsidies and taxes they were wont to pay, northat they were made free of Rome, fo much through the bountie and liberalitie of the Emperour, as it was by Iunius meanes, of whom they had bought it. For these causes the people hated the Emperour Galba. Howbeit the foldiers still lived in good hope, for the gift that was promised them at the beginning, thinking that though they had not as much as was promifed them, yet they should enjoy is much as Nero hadgiven them. But Galba vnderstanding that they complained of him, spake aword meet for so noble & worthy a Prince as he was: that he vsed to chuse soldiers, not to buy them. This word being reported to the foldiers, it bred a maruellous mortall hatred in them against him: because they thought it was not only to take the gift away from the which they hopredently to have received, but that it was also a president to teach the Emperors that shold Galba of come after him, what they should do. Howbeit the rebelling mindes of the Prætorian guard at fended the Rome appeared not yet, but was fecretly kept in for the reuerence they bare vnto the maiesty & foildien. person of Galba, who kept them that were desirous to rebell, because they saw as yet no beginning of any change or alteration. This did fomewhat smother & keepe in the shew of their wickedintent. But they which had before served vnder Verginius, and were at that time vnder Flac-CUSIN GERMANIE, thinking themselues worthy of great reward for the battell they had won against Vindex, and having nothing given them in recompence, they would not be pleased with any thing their Captaine said vnto them, neither did they make any account of Flaceus, because he could not ftirre himfelfe, he was so plagued with the gout, and besides that, he had no maner of experience in warres. So one day when certaine sports were made, at the bringing in of the Tumble 4which, the Colonels & Captaines (according to the maner of the Romaines) made praiers vntothe gods for ŷ health & prosperity of the Emperor Galba: there were diners of the that made and legions anoisearthe first, and afterwards when the Captaines continued on their praiers, in the end the of the Ro. foldiers answered: If they be worthy. The legions in like maner under Tigellinus charge, did oftentimes vie fuch insolent parts: whereof Galbaes officers did advertise him by letters. Wherfore Galba being afraid, & mistrusting that they did not only despise him for his age, but also because behad no childre, he determined to adopt some yong gentlema for his son, of the noblest house ofycity of Rome, & to proclaime him his successor in the Empire. At that time there was one Marcus Otho, of a noble house, but euer giuento sensualitie and pleasure from his cradle, as much as any Romaine could be. And as Homer oftetimes doth call Parie y husbad of the faire Helen, VVVV 2 naming him by the name of his wife, because he had no other commendable vertue in him: euch Poppea, O- To Otho came to be knowne in Rome, by marying Poppea, whom Nero loued when the was Crifpinus his wife: howbeit, bearing some respect to his wife, and being affraid also of his mother, he had inticed Otho to be his band vnto her. Nero loued Otho dearely, and much delighted in his companie, because he was so good a fellow and free of his flesh; and was very glad sometime to heare how he mocked him, calling him niggard. The report went, that as Nero on a time was annointing himself with precious oyles & perfumes, he cast a litle vpon Otho as he went by: who the next day made him a feast in his house, where sodainly were thrust into the hal, divers vessels of gold and filuer ful of this perfumed oyle, that ran out of the like conduit water, & did wet all the hall. So Otho having first possessed Poppea, and abused her vnder hope of Neroes love, he perfwaded her to be divorced from her husbad. The which she did, & he received her home to his owne house, as his lawfull wife; not being so wel pleased to have part, as he was sory & angry alfo to let another enioy her. Now Poppea her self (as it is reported) did not mislike this his iclonfie, for sometimes she would shut her doore against Nero, though Otho were not within either because she would keepe Nero in breath, and in loue-liking still, or else as some thought, because she would not have Casar to her husband; and likewise that she would not refuse him forher friend, because he was wantonly ginen. But so it is, otho was in danger of his life by marying of Poppaa: and fo was it alfo a strange thing, that Nero having put his wife & fifter to death, onely to marry Poppea, he did yet pardon Othe, & faued his life. Howbeit it was for Senecaes fake that was his friend, through whose perswasion he was sent to y farthest part in Spaine along the Ocean fea, to be gouernor of Lysitania. And there he gouerned so wifely, that he was nothing chargeable nor troublesome vnto the country:knowing that this honorable charge was give him only to mitigateand hide his banishment. Áfterwards when Galba had rebelled, he was the first of all the Gouernors of the prouinces that ioyned with him, and bringing with him all his plate, both gold and silver, vnto the mint-master, he gave it him to put into bullion, and so to be converted into currat coine. Moreouer, he gane of his officers vnto Galba, those which he thought the meetest men to serue a Prince: and otherwise when he was tried, he shewed himselfe as faithfull and skilful in matters of state, as any one that followed the Emperors traine. Infomuch as althe way he went many dayes journey in coach with Galba himfelf, & did maruelloufly curry fauor with Titus Iunius, bestowing great gifts vpon him, & also enterraining him with pleasant speeches:but specially, because he willingly gaue him the vpper hand, wherby he was affured to be the second person in credit about Galba. So in all that he did, he far excelled Junius, for that he granted mens fuits frankly & freely without one penie taking, and was besides easie to be spoken with ofenery manthat had any suite to him:but specially of the soldiers, whom he did greatly help and surther, & caused divers also to be called to honorable office, he himself partly moving y Emperor for them, without any labour or fuite made vnto him, and partly also obtaining them at Iunius hands, and of the two infranchised bondmen of Galba, Icellus, and Asiaticus. For these threemen did beare al the sway & creditabout the Emperor in the court. Moreouer, alwaies when he inuited the Emperor to his house, he bribed the Prætorian guard that waited vpon him, and gauceuery soldier a crown. Now this in fight, seemed chiefly to be done to honor the Emperor with: though indeed it was a fine device to overthrow him, to bribe the foldiers in that fort as he did. So Galba confulring whom he should make his successor, T. Iunius preferred Othovnto him the which he did not fimply of himfelf, nor without reward, but only with promife that 0 the should mary his daughter, if Galba did adopt him his fonne, and proclaime him successor in the Empire. Howbeit, Galba did alway specially regard the comonwealth before his private liking, & sought to adopt such a one, as should not so much please himselfe, as otherwise should be profitable and meet for the Empire. But furely in my opinion Galba would not make Otho heire of his goods, confidering what an vnreasonable spender he was, and how sumptuous in all his things, and besides, far gone in debt: for he ought aboue fine thousand Myriades. So when he had heard Innius counsel about this adoption, he gently without other answer, did put ouer his determination vntil another time, and made Otho only Conful at that time, and T. Iunius Conful with him: whereby it was straight supposed, that arthe beginning of the new yeare, he would proclaime himhis fucceffor in the Empire. Which was the thing the fouldiers most defired of all other. But now, delaying still his determination, the legions of the Romaines in Germany, did rife and rebel against him all at an instant. For he was generally hated of all his souldiers, because he paidthem northegift he had promifed them. So they particularly to cloke their malicious intent, alledged for their cause of rising, that he had dishonorably rejected Verginius Rusus; and that the GAVLES which had fought against them, were rewarded with great and rich priviledges, and they that rooke not part with Vindex, had bene grieuously punished and put to death. Moreover, that Galhadid onely honour Findex death after he was dead, as acknowledging his good will vnto him, offering publike oblations and funerall facrifices for him, as if by him only he had bene proclaimed Emperour. Now fuch speeches and rumors ran through the camp among st them, when the first day of the year ecame, which the Romains call the Calends of Ianuary; on which day whe Flaceus had called the fouldiers together, to sweare them to the Emperour according to the cufrom they plucked downe Galbaes images, and sware onely in the name of the people and Se- The soulds. nate of Rome. The Captaines seeing what course they tooke, were as much afraid of the danger diers do retobe without a head, as they stood doubtful of the mischief of their rebellion. So there stept vp one amongst them and said: My fellowes in armes, what do we meane: we neither chuse any other Emperor, nor yet do allow of him that is Emperor at this present: wherby we shew plainly, that we do not onely refuse Galba, but also all other to be our head and Emperor that may command vs. Now for Flaccus Ordeonius, that is but Galbaes shadow and image, I would wish we houldlet him alone there as he is. And for Vitellius, Governor of the lower Germany, he is not far from vs, but one daies iourney only, whose father was Censor at Rome, & thrice also Confull, and that was in a maner a Peere and companion of Clodius Cafar in the government of the Empire: whose pouerty if any man mislike in him, is a manifest proofe of his goodnes and magnanimitie. Him therefore let vs chuse, and let the world know that we can tell how to chuse an Emperour, better then the Spaniards or Lysitanians. Some of the fouldiers that stood by, confirmed these words, but others misliked of them: insomuch that among the rest there was an enfigne-bearer that stole secretly out of the campeto carie Vitellius newes hereof, who that night made a great supper, and had great store of good company with him. These newes running straight through his campe, Fabius Valens Colonell of a legion, came the next morning with a great number of horsemen, and was the first manthat named Vitellins Emperor, who before seemed to refuse that name, as one that was afraid to take the charge of so great an Empire vpon him; but after dinner, being full of wine and meate, he came out among them, and accepted the vicilia name of Germanicus which they gauchim, and refused the name of Cesar. But therewithall incontinently after, Flaceus fouldiers leaving their goodly popular oath which they had fworne in Germanics thename of the people and Senate, they all then took their othes faithfully to do what it should but use of please the Emperour Vitellius to command them. Thus Vitellius was chosen Emperour in Gen-Vitellius MANIE. So Galba hearing of this new change, thought it not good to deferre time longer for named Emthe adoption he had intended: wherefore certainely voderstanding that those whom he trusted most about him, were parties in this matter, some taking part with Dolabella, and the most part of them with otho, neither liking the one nor the other, fodainly without any word spoken to any man, he fent for Pife (that was the yonger fonne of Crassius and Pife, whom Nere had put to death) a yong man faire conditioned, and shewed by his grave and modest countenance he had by vertue, that he was indued with many noble vertues. Galba came downe presently from Galbaadob. his pallace, and went straight to the campe to proclaime Pifo Cafar, and his successor in the Em- ted Pifohis pire. Howbeit at his fetting out of his pallace, there appeared many great fignes in the firmament which followed him. And moreouer, when he was also come into his campe, and that he began to fay without book part of his oration, and partly also to reade it, it lightned al the while hespake, and there fell such a great shower of raine upon it, and a maruellous thicke mist in the campe, and ouer all the citic, that men might eafily fee the gods did not like this adoption, and that it wold not profper. The fouldiers themfelues shewed their discontentment by their heavy lookes, and the rather, because at that time there was no speech of reward or liberalitie. And furthermore, they that were present also maruelled much (for that they could gather by the countenance and words of Pife) that Pife nothing reloyced at this great fauour, although he lacked not wit and understanding otherwise to acknowledge it. And on the other side also, they found cally by others lookes, many fignes and proofes that he was maruelloufly offended in his mind, tolee that he was thus deceived of his hope. For he being the man that was first spoken of, and thought most worthie of all other, and being come also so neare vnto it, now to see himselfe thus whipped out of it, he supposed that it was a plaine proofe that Galba had no good opinion of him, & that he maliced him in his heart, fo that after that time he still stood in seare of his life. For he being afraid of Pifo, hating also Galba, and being grieuously offended with T. Iunius, he went his way full of divers thoughts in his mind. But the Soothfayers, Astronomers, and Chaldeans. which heeuer kept about him, did perswade him not to be discouraged for this, nor to cast all hope afide : and specially one Ptolomy, in whom he had great confidence, because he had oftentimes before foretold and affured him, that Nero should not put him to death, but contrarily, that Were should die first, & he himself survive him, & should become Emperor of Rome. Whereby Ptolomy having proved his first prediction true vnto him, he bad him be bold, and feare not that to come. But now besides him, those that secretly complained vnto him, did prickhim forward the more, fighing to see him so enill dealt with by Galba, and divers of them chiefly, which bare great authoritie and credit about Tigellinus & Nymphidius; who being then cast off, and discountenanced, came all vnto him, and stirred him vp the more. As amongst others, Veturius and Bar-Tefferarine, bins chiefly, of the which the one had bene Optio, & the other Tefferarins; (for fo the Romaines call those that be their messengers, spials, and officers to the captaines) who with an infranchised bondman of his called Onomastus, went vnto the campe, and there corrupted some soldiers with readie monie, and other some with faire words, being of themselves evill inclined, and expected but occasion to otter their malice. For other wise had the foldiers bin all of one mind, it had not binan enterprise to haue bin brought to passe in foure dayes space (being no more betwist the adoption and murther) to make a whole camp rebel in that fort. For they were flain y fificenth day of Ianuary, on which day Galba did facrifice in the morning within his pallace, before his friends. But at that time the Soothfayer called Ombricius, whe he had the intrails of the beafts faof Ombries crificed in his hands, and had looked vpon them, he spake not doubtfully but plainly, that he saw fignes of great tumult and rebellion, & that the Emperor was in present danger of great treason. Whereby it plainly appeared, that the gods had put Galba into Othors hands for he flood at that time behind Galba, and both heard and faw all that the Sooth fayers did. So he seeming to be grieued withall in his mind, and his colour changing off for the feare he was in, his infranchifed bondman Onomastus came and told him, that the majons and chiefe carpenters were come to speake with him, and taried for him. This was the watch-word agreed vpon betweene them, at which time Otho shold then go vnto the soldiers. Then Otho faid, that he went to looke to an old house he had bought, which was falling downe, and in decay, and that he would shew it vnto the workemen. So he went his way, and came from the pallace, by the place they call Tiberius house, into the market place, where the golde pillar standeth, where also the greatest high waies of all ITALY do meete together. There certaine met him that first called him Emperour, which were not in all about three and twentie persons. Thereupon, though Otho was not viconstant, as it appeared (notwithstanding he was so fine and effeminate a man) but rather resolute and four in instant danger : yet feare so oppressed him at that time, that he would faine haue left his enterprise. Howbeit the soldiers would not suffer him, but compassing his litter round about with their armes, and their fwords drawne in their hands, they commanded the litter mentogo forward. So Othoas he went hastening on his drivers, he often muttered to himselfe, Iam but dead. Some hearing him as they passed by him, rather wondred, then that they were otherwise troubled, to see such a small number of men about him, that they durst venter vpon so hard an enterprise. Now as he was caried through the market place, he was met withall by certaine others, and afterwards by others, by three and by foure in a company: all which came and ioy. ned with him, and cryed Cafar, Cafar, hauing their fwords drawne in their hands. Now the Colonell appointed for that day to guard the field of Mars, knew nothing of this conspiracie, but being amazed and atraid with their fodaine coming, he suffered them to come in. So when otho was comein, he foud no man that refifted him. For they that knew nothing of the practife, being compatfed in with those that were made priny to it, & had knowne it of long time, being found stragling here and there, by one and by two, they followed the rest for scare at the first, & afterwards for good will. This was brought ftraight to Galba to the pallace, the Soothfayer being yet bufic about this facrifice:infomuch that they which before gaue no credite to those divinations, began then to maruell much at this heavenly figne. Then there ran immediatly a great number of people from the market place, vnto the pallace. Thereupon Innius and Lacon, and certaine other of Galbaes infranchised bondmen, stood to guard Galbaes person with their swords drawne in their hands. Pifo also went out to speake vnto the soldiers that guarded the Emperors person.

Morcouer, because the ILLYRIAN legio lay out of the camp in a place called Vipsanus, they dispatched away Marius Celsus with al speed, a very honest man to get that place. Galba in the mean time flood in doubt whether he should come out of the pallace or not for Iunius would not let him go, but Celfus and Lacon perswaded him to go out infomuch as they fell at great words with Junius that went about to diffwade him from it. In this stirre there ranne a rumor that Othowas flaine in the field. Immediatly after came Iulius Atticius, one of the noblest men of all the Emperours guard, and shewed his sword drawne, crying that he had flaine Cafars enemie; and thrust through the prease, and got to Galba, and shewed him his sword bloudied. Galba looking him in the face asked him who comanded him to do it. The foldier answered him the faith and oath he had made vnto him. Therewith all the people that stood by cried out, it was nobly done of him. and clapped their hands for ioy. Then Galba taking his litter, went out of his pallace to do facrificeto Iuviter, and also to shew himself openly. Howbeit he was no sooner come into the market place, but he heard contrary newes, that Otho was Lord and mafter of the whole camp & army. Then as it happeneth in so great a prease of people, some cried out to him to returne back again, ramult for others would have him to go forward: others bad him be afraid of nothing, & others willed him Galba. to looke to himself. So his litter being thus turmoiled to and fro, as tost vpon the sea, sometime borne back, otherwhile caried forward, first of all they saw certain horsmen, and then sootmen alfoarmed coming from Paules pallace, al of them together crying out with loud voice. Hence, hence, primate man. Then all the people fet vpon a running, not flying difperfedly, but in heapes, vpon porches and stals in the market place, as it had bin to have seene some fight or sport. Then one called Attilius Sarcello, ouerthrew one of the images of Galba, which was as it were a beginning of open warres. Others round about threw darts on enery fide of him against his litter. But doth call when they faw they could not kill him, then they came nearer to his litter with their fwords him Pirgi. drawne in their hands, and neuer a man of his left with him to offer to defend him, fauing one man onely, whom the Sunne saw that day, amongst so many thousands of men, worthy of the Empire of Rome: and he was called * Sempronius. He having received privately no manner of pleasure at Galbaes hand, but onely to discharge his oath and dutie, stepped before the litter, and Tasius lifting up a vine branch he had in his hand (with the which the ROMAINE Captaines do vieto him Denbeate their foldiers that have offended) he fell out with them that did fet vpon him, and prayed (11.2) them to hold their hands, and not to hurt their Emperour. But in the end when he faw they Therate. would not leave, but that they fell to it in good earnest, he then drew his sword, and bare off the blowes as well as he could vntill they hought him, that he fel to the ground. Then Galbaes litter Surpromiss being overthrowne right in the place called Curtius lake, Galba lay on the ground armed in his indistinguishers curaces. The traiterous fouldiers flew vpon him, and gaue him many a wound: and Galba holding out his necke vnto them, bade them strike hardily, if it were to do their countrey good, So perons Gali he had many wounds on his armes and his thighs; as it is reported; howbeit the foldier that flue the death him was called Camurius, of the fifteenth legion. Others do report that it was one Terentius, of semproother also say Areadius; and some other do call him Fabius Fabulus; who having stricken off his head, wrapped it in the lap of his gowne, because he could not otherwise take hold of it, for that of Galbai he was all bald. How beit his fellowes & conforts would not fuffer him to hide it, but rather that and his his notable fact he had done should be seene. Therefore he set it vpon the point of his lance, and lo shaking the face of this poore old man, (a wife and temperate Prince, and chiefe Bishop, and Confull) he ranne vp and downe (like mad women possessed with the spirit and furie of Bacchus at the feasts of Bacchus) bowing down his launce being all of a goare bloud. When his head was brought to othe, it is faid he cried out aloud: Tush, my fellowes, this is nothing, vnlesse you bring me also Pisos head. So not long after, they brought him his head also. For the young man being hurt, fled, and was followed by one called * Marcus, who flue him hard by the temple of * other to Vefta. So did they also kill Titus Junius: who openly confessed that he was one of the conspiracy sade Muragainst Galba, and cried out to them that flue him, that Otho did not know that they did kill him. The more This notwithstanding, the soldiers strake off his head and Lacons also, and brought them both the of Pie. to Otho to receive the reward. Howbeit, as the Poet Archilochus saith: Of seuen peraduenture saine dead on the ground,

A thousand will say, that they all caue the wound.

So there was diuerse men at that time, who being no partakers of this murther, had bloudied all their hands and swords, and so shewed them bloudied to have reward also: but Vitellus not-VVVV 4 into the field also, one Marius Celsus, whom divers men accused to have perswaded the souldiers to aide Galba, and the common people cried out, and bade he should be put to death. Howbeit Otho would not suffer them to kill him : and yet being afraid to contrary the souldiers minds, he told them they should not kill him so rashly, because he was first to learne some things more of him. So he commanded them to bind him, and deliuered him to be kept of those he trusted most. Afterwards the Senate was presently assembled: who, as if men had bene sodainly changed from them they were, or as if there had bene new gods, they all sware by the name of other (the which oath he himselse had before sworne vnto Galba, and did not keepe it) and called him besides, Angustus & Casar; the bodies of them that were slaine lying yet headlesse on the ground in the market place, all in their Confuls robes. And as for their heads, the fouldiers after they could tell no more what to do with them, they fold the head of Titus Iunius vnto his daughter. for the summe of two thousand fine hundred Drachmaes. And for Pifees head, his wifethrough intreatic begged it of one Veranius. On the other fide, for Galbaes head, they gaue it vnto Patro-bius and Vitellius feruants: who, after they had vied it as vilely as they should deuise, they threwir at length in a place where their bodies are cast, who the Casars put to death, the which they call Sestertium. Now for his bodie Heluidius Priseus, through Othoes sufferance, caried it away, and Argins, one of his infranchised bondmen, buried it by night. Thus haue you heard the historie of Galba, a manthat in nobilitie and wealth, was inferior to few Romaines, and in them both was the chiefest man of all his time, & had alway lived in honorable fame and estimation, in the reigne of fiue Emperours. So that he ouercame Nero by his good name, and the good opinion men had of him, and not through his owne force and power. For of them that stroug to make themselues Emperours at that time, some found no man that thought them worthy of it: others did put forth the selues, as thinking themselues worthy of it. Howbeit Galba was called vnto it, and obeyed them that called him, vfing his name against Vindex boldnes: whereby he procured, that his rifing (which before was called innovation and rebellion) was then called civil warre, after that his faction came to have a man to be their head, thought worthy to be their Emperor.

And therefore he did not so much desire to be Emperor for himselfe, as to do good to his countrey and common-wealth. But yet he erred, in feeking to command the fouldiers, whom Tigellinus and Nymphidius had spoiled by their flatteries: euen as in old time Scipie, Fabricius, and Camillus did command the fouldiers of the Empire of Rome at that time. So he being now avery old man, shewed himselfea good Emperour and after the old fort, in his behauiour towards the fouldiers only; but in all other things else, being caried away with the couetousnesses of Titus Iunius and Laco, and of other his infranchised bondmen, he left none

THE LIFE OF Otho.

HE next morning, the new Emperour by breake of day went vnto the other me-Capitoll, and facrificed, and there fent for Marius Celfus to come vnto deration at him, whom he courteously saluted, and prayed him rather to forget the the begincause of his imprisonment, then to remember his deliuerie. Marius reigns. Celfus made him a wife and noble answer againe, and said, that the matter for the which they would have accused him vnto him, did witnesse his behauiour, shewing himselfe faithfull vnto Galba, who never did him any pleasure. These words of them both did maruellously please the people: and so did they like the souldiers also wonderfully well. Moreouer, after he had very fauourably & gracioully taken order for matters in the Senate, the rest of the time he had to be Conful, he employed partly about Verginius Rusus, and did also establish them Consuls in their place and degree, which had bene called vnto that dignitie by Nero, or otherwise by Galba: and he also honoured the oldest Senators and of greatest estimation, with certaine priesthoods. Besides all this, herestored vnto all those Senators that were banished by Nero and called home againe, all their goods yet vnfold. Whereupon the chiefest Magistrates and Noblemen of the citie that quaked before for feare, supposing that he was not aman, but rather a diuell or furie of hell that was come to be Emperour, they all became glad men, for the good hope of this smiling & gracious reigne they were so lately entred into. Moreouer, nothing pleased all the Romaine's together more, nor wanne him the good will of all men for much, as that he did vnto Tigellinus: for it was punishment enough for him, if he had had no more but the feare of the punishment every man threatned him withall, as a thing due to the common wealth, and also by reason of the incurable diseases his bodie was infected withall. Now, though the Noblemen thought his vnreasonable insolencie and lust of the flesh (following naughtie-packs and common ftrumpets, burning still in filthie concupiscence) an extreme punishment, comparable to many deaths; and being also no better then a dead man in a manner, fill following pleafure and sensualitie as long as he could : this notwithstanding, all men were offended with him, that they should see such a wicked creature as he live, that had put so manie noblemen to death. So otho fent for him, who lived very pleasantly at his houses in the countrey, by the citie of SINVESSA, and had ships ever readie vpon the seacoast, to flic if necefficie draue him to it. Thereupon he first sought to bribe him with money which was sent with commission to apprehend him, and perswaded him to let him escape; but when he saw he could not frame him to his mind, yet he refrained not to give him gifts, and praied him to give him leaueto shaue his beard. The other granted him. Then Tigellinus tooke a razor, and did cut his ownethroate. So Otho having pleased the people thus well, he sought not otherwise to be reuenged of his prinate iniuries. Moreouer, to currie fauour with the common people, he refufed not to be called Nero, in any open affemblies at the Theaters. Also when certaine private men had set vp Neroes images in open fight, otho was not offended withall: but moreouer, Clodius Rufus writeth, that the letters patents & commissions were sent into Spaine by posts, subfcribing the goodly name of Nero, with the name of otho. Howbeit; when it came to his eares that the noblemen of Rome misliked of it, he left it off, and would write it no more in his letters. So Otho having begun in this fort to establish his Empire, the soldiers maruellously troubled him. For they continually perswaded him to take heed to himself, and to beware how noblemen and gentlemen came neare vnto him: which they did, either for that indeed they bearing him good will, were afraid fome treacherie or treafon should be secretly practifed against him; or els it was some seined deuice to set all together by the cares, and to bring it to civill war. For when Otho himselfe had sent Crispinus with his seuenteenth legion to bring him certaine prisoners, and that Crispinus was ready before day, going to performe the effect of his commission, having loden carts with armour and weapon for the fouldiers: the desperatest and bouldest men among them, began to crie out, and faid, that Crispinus meant no good in his heart, and that the Senate went about to make some change and stirre, and that his armour and weapons were not for Cafar, but against him. These words moued many mens consciences, and made them to rebell: so that some laid hold vpon the carts to stay them, others slue two Centurions out of hand, and Crifpinus himselfalso that would have staied them. Thereupon all of them together, one enconraging another, went directly to Rome, as meaning to aide the Emperour. But when they came thither, vnderstanding that there were foure score Senators at supper with the Emperour, they ranne straight to the pallace, crying out, that it was a good occasion offered them to kil all Casars enemies at a clap. Hercupon all Rome was straight in armes, looking immediatly after to be facked and spoiled of all that cuer they had: and the people ranne vp and downe the pallace, here and there, otho himselfe also being in great feare and distresse. For men might easily see he was afraid, because of his guests he had bidden, not for himselfe, seeing them all amazed with the matter, for feare not speaking a word vnto him, but staring on him still, and specially thosethat came and brought their wives with them to supper. So othe fodainly fent the Captaines vnto the fouldiers, and commanded them to speake with them, and to pacifie them as well as they could: and therewithall he made them take away the boord, and conueyed his guests out of his pallace by secret posternes. So they saued themselues, passing through the souldiers, a little before they entred into the hall where the feast was kept, crying out, and asking, what was become of Cefars enemies. So the Emperour rifing from his bed, he pacified them with gentle words, the teares standing in his eyes, and thereby at length he sent them all away. The next morning he liberally bestowed vpon enery fouldier a thousand two hundred and fiftie Drachmaes; and then he went into the market place, and there gaue great commendation vnto the common people for their readie good wils they shewed vnto him: howbeit, he said there were some among them, that vnder colour and pretext of honestie, did commit many leud parts, and made his goodnesse and grace towards them to be cuill spoken of, and their constancie and faith also to be misliked of, and prayed them his griefe might be theirs, and that the offenders might be punished. They all confirmed his words, and bad him aloud he should do it. So otho thereupon caused two of them onely to be apprehended, supposing no man would be greatly offended with the punishment of them, and then went his way. Those that loued and trusted him, maruelled much to fee this change. Other were of opinion, that it flood him vpon fo to do, to winne the fouldiers hearts, because of the warreat hand. Now newes came flying to him out of all parts, that Vitellius hadtaken vpon him the authoritie to be Emperour, and posts came to him one in anothers necke, to tel him that numbers of people came in daily to submit theselues vnto Vitellius. Others told him also, how the legions remaining in PANNONIA, DALMATIA, and Mysia, had chosen othe. Immediatly after, friendly letters were brought him also from Mutianus and Vespasianus, the one of them being in Syria, and the other in Iv D. E.A., with great and mightie armies. Whereupon osbogiuing credite vnto them, wrote vnto Vitellius, and bad him beware how he medled with any deeper enterprise then became a prinate souldier; and that he would give him gold and filuer enough, and a great citie, where he might live quietly, and take his pleafure. Vitellius gently answered him at the first, and sported with him but afterwards the falling out one with another, spitefull letters were fent betwixt either parties, one of them reproching another not fafly, but fondly, & foolishly detecting each others vices. For indeed it was hard to judge, which of them two was most licentiously given, most effeminate, least skilfull, poorer, or most indebted before. Now at that time they talked of wonderful signes that had bene feene: how beit they were but flying tales, and there was no man to inflifie them. But in the Capitol there was the image of Victory fet vp in a triumphing chariot, the which every body and Viellifaw did let flacke the reines of the bridles of the horfes which she had in her hands, as though she could not flay them any more. The flatue of Cains Cafar also within y Iland, which flandeth in wonders themiddest of the river of Tyber at Rome, without any earthquake or storme of wind, turned Jeene at ofit felf frő the West to the East: the which (as it is reported) chanced about the time that Vespasubegan to take upon him to be Emperour. Many also tooke the ouerslowing of the river of Tyber for an ill figne. For indeed it was at that time of the yeare when rivers do fwell most, yet Thewm? was inneuer fo great before, neither had it ever done fo much hurt as it did at that time. For it had derfulouerouerflowne her bankes, and drowned the most part of the city, and specially the corne-market: the river of informuch that they fuffered famine many daies after in Rome. In all this stirre newes came that Tyber. Cuinna and Valens (two of Vitellius captains) had taken the mountaines of the Alpes; and moreover in Rom E. Dolabella a noble man, was suspected by the Prætorian souldiers, that he practised sometreason. Now other, either because he was afraid of him, or of some other, he sent him to thecity AQVINVM, promifing him he should have no other hurt. Then choosing the choisest Gentlemen which he would take with him, among others he tooke Lucius, the brother of Vitellimand did not deprive him of any lote of his honor and dignitic. Moreover, he was very care fullto fee his wife and mother fafe, that they should not be afraid of themselves. Besides all this, heappointed Flauius Sabinus, Vefpasians brother, gouernor of Rome in his absence; and did it for Nerves fake, who had before given him the fame honor and authority, the which Galba had taken from him: or els to make Vespasian see, that he loued & trusted him. So he taried behind at BR B s-SELLE, a city standing upon the river of Po:and sent his army before under the conduct of Marius Cellus, of Swetonius Paulinus, and of Gallus and Spurina, all noble and great personages: howbeitthey could not have their wils to rule the armic as they would because of the insolency and flubburnnesse of the fouldiers, who would have no other Captaines but the Emperour onely, The field laying, that he and none other should command them. Indeed, the enemies souldiers also were wardings not much wifer, nor more obedient to their Captaines, but were braue and lustie vpon the selffame occasion; how beit they had this advantage over the other, that they could tel how to fight, fould ter and were all well trained in the warres, and could away with paines and hardneffe, and neuer frunke from it: whereas the Prætorian fouldiers that came from Rome, were fine meale-mouthed men, because they had benelong from the warres, and had liued at ease in Rome, and taken their pleasure in banqueting and playes: and therfore in a brauerie and iolitie, they would needs hauemen thinke, that they disdained to do what their Captaines commanded them, as men that were too good to do ir, & not that they were fine fingered, and loth to take paines. So that, when Spuring would have compelled them, he was in danger of death, & escaped very narrowly that they flue him not. For they stucke not to reuile him, and give him as foule words as they could, calling him traitor, & curfing him, faying that he marred all Cafars affaires. Yea, and there were fome of them, that having their full cups, went in the night to his tent, to aske him leave to depart, faying that they would go to the Emperour, and complaine to him of him. But the flour they had given them by their enemies about that time, hard by the citie of Place ENTIA, did Flacenting fland Spurina and his affaires to great purpose. For Vitellius souldiers coming hard to the wals the services of the citie, did mocke Othors men that were at the cranewes of the fame, and called them fine training dancers and goodly stage-players, that had seene nothing but playes and feasts: and that for feates of armes, and battels, they knew not what it meant: and that the greatest act they ever did, was that they strake off the head of a poore naked old man, meaning by Galba: and that to come to fight a battell in the field before men, their heartes were in their heeles. These vile words galled them to the heart, and made them so mad withall, that they came of themselucs to pray Spurina to command them what he thought good, promifing that from thenceforth they would neuer refuse any paines or danger he would put them to. Thereupon there was a hote affault given to the citic of PLACENTIA, with great store of fundrie engines. Howbeir Spurinaes men had the better, and having with great flaughter repulsed the affailants, they faued The prife of one of the goodlieft, the greatest, and most flourishing cities of all ITALIE. So Othors Can-The prije of cape taines were farre more familiar, curteous, and civil to deale with cities and private men, then Vitellius souldiers were. For, of Vitellius Captaines, Cecinna was neither for person nor manners accompaniable for the people, but strange, monstrous, and troublesome, to see him only a mightie made man, wearing gally gascoignes, and coates with sleeues, after the fashio of the GAVLES.& fpake in this attire vnto the enligne-bearers and Captaines of the Romaines. Furthermore, he had his wife alway with him brauely mounted on horsebacke, gallantly apparelled, & accompa nied with a troupe of the choisest men of armes of al the companies. The other, Fabius Valens, he was so couetous, that no spoile of enemies, no polling of subjects, nor bribes taken of their frieds and confederates, could quench or fatisfie his vnfatiable couetoufneffe: whereby it feemeth that was the let, that coming on fo flowly, he was not at the first battell. Howbeit others do blame Cecima for it, that made too much haft, for the defire he had to have the only honour of thevi-Ctory to himselse: and this was the cause, that besides his other light faults, he also made this, that he gaue battell out of due time and season, and when it came to the point indeed, yet he fought it not out valiantly, so that he had almost cast all away: For when he had the repulse fro Placen-TIA, he went vnto CREMONA another great citie. And Annius Gallus going to aide Spurina, who was befieged in the citie of PLACENTIA, when he heard by the way that the PLACENTINES had the better, and that the CREMONEN'S ES were in great danger and diffresse, he marched thither with his armie, and went and camped hard by the enemics. After that also, theother Captaines of either side came to aide their men. Howbeit Cecinna hauing laied a great number of his best fouldiers well armed in ambush, in certaine thicke groues and woods, he commanded his horsemento march forward, and if the enemies came to charge them, that they should retire litle and litte, making as though they fled, vntill they had drawne them within his am bush. So there were certainetraitors that bewrayed the ambush vnto Marius Celsus, who came against them with his choice men of armes, and did not follow them ouer rashly, but compassed in the place where the ambush lay, the which he raised, & in the meane time sent to his campe with all possible speed to his footmen to make hast thitherward; and it seemeth, that if they had come in time, they had not left one of their enemies aliue, but had marched upon the bellies of all Cicinnaes armie, if they had followed the horsemen in time, as they should have done. But Paulinus being come too late to aide them, for that he came fo flowly, he was burdened that he did not the dutie of a Captaine that bare the name and countenance he caried. Furthermore, the common soldiers accused him of treason vnto Otho, and stirred vp their Emperour against him, & spake very big words of themselues, saying, that they had ouercome for their owne parts, had not the cowardlinesse of their owne Captaines bene, who put them by the victorie. So othodid not trust him so much, that he would not make him beleeue but that he mistrusted somewhat. Therefore he sent his brother Titianus to the camp, and Proclus with him, Captain of the Prætorian guard, who indeed commanded all but in fight, Titianus had all the honor, as bearing the name of the Emperours Lieutenant. Marins Celsus and Paulinus followed after, bearing the name of Counfellers and friends onely:howbeit otherwise they medled with nothing, neither had any authoritie giuen them. On the other fide, the enemies were in as much trouble as they, and those specially whom Valens led. For when newes was brought of the coffict that was between them in this ambush, they were angrie with him, because they were not at it, and for that he had not led them thither, to helpe their men that were flaine: infomuch that he had much ado to pacific and quiet the, they were for eadie to have flowne vpon him. So Valens at length removed his campe, and went and loyned with Cecinna. Howbeit Otho being come to his camp at the towne of Ba-BRIACYM, which is a litle towne hard by CREMONA, he consulted with his Captaines whether he should give battell or not. So Proclus and Titianus: gave him counsell to fight, considering that the fouldiers were very willing to it, by reason of the late victorie they had wonne, and wished him not to deferre it: for thereby he should but discourage his armie, which was now willing to fight, and also give their enemies leysure to stay for their Chiefetaine Vitellius, who came himselfe out of GAVLE. But Paulinus in contrarie manner alledged, that the encenies had all their force and power present, with the which they thought to fight with them, and also to ouercome them, and that they wanted nothing: whereas otho looked for another armie out of Mysia and Pannonia, as great an army as his enemies had already, fothat he could rary his time, and not ferue his enemies turne and also, that if the fouldiers being now but a few in numher were willing to fight, they should then be much more encouraged, when they should have greater company, and should also fight with better safety. Furthermore he perswaded the, that to delay time was for their auaile, confidering that they had plenty & ftore of all maner of prouisson where the enemics on the other side, being also in their enemies countrey, their victuals would quickly faile them. Marius Celfus liked very well of these perswasions; and so did Annius Gallus, who was not present at this councell (but gone from the camp, to be cured of a fal he had from his horse) but he was written to by Otho to have his opinion also. So Annius Gallus returned answer, that he thought it not best to make haste, but to stay for the army that came out of Mysta, confidering they were onwards on their way. Howbeit Otho would not hearken to this counfell, but followed their minds that concluded of battell: for the which were alledged di-uerse occasions. Butthe chiefest and likeliest cause was that the souldiers which are called the Prætorian guard (being the daily guard about the Emperours person) finding then in effect what it was to professe to be a souldier, and to live like a souldier, they lamented their continu- FAB 1941 ing in Rome, where they lived at case and pleasure, feasting and banqueting, never feeling the terfouldidiffeommodities and bitter paines of war; and did therfore so earnestly cry out to fight, that there was no staying of them, as if they should at their first cry & setting forward, haue ouerthrowne same tipe at their enemies. Moreouer, it feemed also that othe himself could no more away with the feare & ling the doubt of the vncertaine fucceffe to come, neither could any longer abide the grieuous thoughts paints and of the danger of his eftate, he was fo effeminate, and vnacquainted with forow and paines. This frant of a was the cause that caried him on headlong, as a man that shutteth his eyes falling from a high place, and fo to put al at aduenture. The matter is thus reported by Secundus the Orator, & Othoes Secundus Secretary. Others also do report, that both armies had diverse determinations and minds: as to the Orator. ione all together in one campe, and iontly to chuse among them, if they could agree, the worthick man of all the Captaines that were there: if not, then to assemble the whole Senate in a the Enga. place together, and there to suffer the Senators to chuse such a one Emperour, as they liked best tour. of. And fure it is very likely it was so, confidering that neither of the both which were then called Emperors, was thought meet for the place they had and therefore that these counsels & considerations might easily fall into the Romain B fouldiers heads (who were wise men and expert fouldiers,) that indeed it was a thing for them iustly to missible, to bring themselves into the like miscrable time and calamitie, which their predecessors before them had caused one another to fuffer: first for Sylla and Marius sakes, and afterwards for Casar and Pompey; and now to bestow the Visellius a Empire of Rome either vpon Vitellius, to make him the abler to follow his drunkennes & glut- drunkend tonic:or else vpon othe, to maintaine his wanton and licentious life. This was the cause that moued Celfus to delay time, hoping to end the wars without trouble & danger: and that caused Otho Otho Otho tomake the more haft, being afraid of the same. How beit othe returning backe again into BRES-SELLES, he committed another fault, not only because he tooke his mens goodwils from them "" to fight, the which his presence, and the reuerence they bare vnto him did put in them: but be- The towns causealso he cariedaway with him for the guard of his person, the valiantest souldiers and most resolute me of al his host. About that time there chanced a skirmish to fal out by the river of Po, the river of because Cecinna built a bridge ouer it, & Othoes men did what they could to hinder them. How. Po. beit when they faw they preuailed not, they laded certaine barges with faggots and dry wood. all rubbed oner with brimftone and pitch, and fetting them on fire, they fent them downe the freame. When the barges were in the middest of the streame, there suddenly grose a winde out of the river, which blew upon this wood-stacke they had prepared to cast among the enemics workes of this bridge, that first made it smoke, and immediatly after fell all on a slame; which did fo trouble the men in the barges, that they were driven to leape into the river to fave themfelues: and fo they loft their barges, and became themfelues alfo prifoners to their enemies, to their great shame and mockerie. Furthermore, the Germains vnder Vitellius, fighting with Othors fencers, which of them should win a litle Iland in the middest of the river, they had the Vpper hand, and flue many of the fencers. Thereupon Othoes fouldiers which were in BEBRIA. cym, being in a rage withall, and would needs fight, Proclus brought them into the field, and went and camped about fiftie furlongs out of the city, fo fondly, and to fo litle purpole, that being the spring of the yeare, and all the countrey thereabout full of brookes and rivers, yet they notwithstanding lacked water. The next morning they raised their campe to meete with their enemies the same day, and were driven to march above an hundred furlongs. Now Paulinus perfwaded them to go faire and foftly, and not to make more hast then needed; and would not so foone as they should come (being wearied with their iourney and trauell) set vpon their enemies that were wel armed, & besides had leisure & time inough to settheir men in battell ray, whilest they were coming fo long a journey with all their cariage. Now the Captaines being of diuerse opinions about this matter, there came a horseman from Otho, one of those they call the Nomades, that brought them letters, in the which Otho commanded them to make all the haft they could, and to lose no time, but to march with all speed towards the enemie. So when the letters were read, the Captaines presently marched forward with their army. Cecinna vnderstanding of their coming, was astonicd at the first; and suddenly for sooke the worke of his bridge to returne to his campe, where he found the most part of his souldiers ready armed, and Valens had given them their fignall and word of battell. And in the meane time, whilest the legions were taking their places to set themselues in battell ray, they sent out before, the choisest horsemen they had, to skirmish. Now there ran a rumor (no man knew how, nor vpon what cause) that Vitellius Captaines would turne on Othoes side in battell, insomuch that when these men of armes came neare to meet with the voward of Othoes army, Othoes men did speake very gently to them, and called them companions. Vitellius men on the other fide tooke this falutation in cuill part, and answered them againe in rage, as men that were willing to fight: Insomuch that those which had spoken to them, were quite discouraged; and the residue also began to fuspect their companions which had spoken to them, and mistrusted them to be traytors. And this was the chiefest cause of all their disorder, being ready to joyne battel. Furthermore, on the enemies fide alfo, all was out of order for the beaft's of cariage ran in attongft them that fought, and fo did put them maruellously out of order. Besides that also, the disaduantage of the place where they fought, did compell them to difperse one from another, because of fundry ditches & trenches that were betweene them, whereby they were compelled to fight in diverse companies together. So there were but two legions only, the one of Vitellius, called the Deuourer: & the other of Otho, called the Helper: which getting out of these holes & dirches apart by themselues, in a good plaine euen ground, fought it out so a long time together in good order of battell. othree soldiers were men of goodly personages, strong & valiant of their hands, how beit they had troixt the neuer served in the warres, nor had ever foughten battel but that. And Vitellius men on the other and Vitelfide, were old beaten foldiers, & had ferued all their youth, & knew what wars & battels meant. So when they came to ioyne, Othoes men gaue fucha lufty charge vpon the first onset, that they led by prety ouerthrew, & flue all the first ranke, and also wan the ensigne of the Eagle. Vitellius men were so names, De. ashamed of it, and therewith in such a rage, that they tooke heart againe vnto them, and ran in so desperately vpon their enemies, that at the first they slue the Colonell of all their legion, & wan diuerse ensignes. And furthermore, against others fencers (which were accounted the valiantest antnesse of men, and readiest of hand) Varus Alphenus brought his men of armes called the BATTAVII, the Batta. uÿ in wars. which are Germaines in the lower part of Germanie, dwelling in an Iland compassed about Note the with the river of Rhene. There were few of his fencers that stucke by it, but the most of them ran trim feruice of fen away towards the river, where they found certaine enfignes of their enemies fet in battell ray, cers, and who put them all to the sword, and not a man of them scaped with life. But about all other, none mhat foul proued more beafts & cowards, then the Prætorian guard. For they would not tary till the encdiersthey mics came to give them charge, but cowardly turned their backes, and fled through their owne The Otho men that were not ouerthrowne; and so did both disorder them, and also make them afraid. This nians ouer_ notwithstanding, there were a great number of others men who having overthrown the voward tell by the of those that made head against them, they forced a lane through their enemies that were con-Vitellians. querours, and so valiantly returned backe into their campe. But of their Captaines, neither Pro-The coclus nor Paulinus durst returne backe with them, but fled another way, being afraid of the fury of waraline ffe of the freshthe foldiers, that they would lay all the fault of their ouerthrow vpon their Captaines. Howbewater foul. it Annius Gallus received them into the city of Berlacym, that came together after this over-Marius Cel. throw, and told them that the battell was equall betwixt them, and that in many places they had fus Oration had the better of their enemies. But Marius Celfus gathering the noble men & gentlementogeto Othoes ther that had charge in the army, he fel to coultation what they should do in so great a calamity, fouldiers perswading and extreme flaughter of the ROMAINE citizens. For if othe himselfe were an honest man, he should no more attempt Fortune confidering that Cato and Scipio were both greatly blamed for that they were the cause of casting away of many men in AFRICKE to no purpose (though they fought for the liberty of the Romaines) and only of felf-will, for that they would not yeeld to Telius Cefar after he had won the battel of PHARSALIA. For though Fortune in all other things hane power ouer men: yet extremities happening to good men, the cannot preuent them to determine the best for their safety. These perswassons straight caried away y Captains, who went presently to feele the minds of the private soldiers, whom they found all of them desirous of peace. So Titianus perswaded them to fend Ambassadours vnto the enemies to treate of peace; and Celsus and Gallus tooke vpon them the charge to go thither, to breake the matter vnto Ceinna and Valens. But by the way they met with certaine Centurions, who told them how all greld them. the army of the enemies were coming onwards on their way, to come directly to the city of B a-BRIACVM, and that their Chieftaines had fent before to offer treatic of peace. Celsus & his companion Gallus being glad of this, prayed the Centurions that they would return e with them vnto Cecinna. But when they were come neare vnto him, Celfus was in great danger of his life: beconferhe men of armes which he had ouerthrowne certaine dayes before in an ambufh, coming before, when they fpied him, they flew vpon him with great shouts. Howbeit the Centurions that were in his company, stepped before him, and closed him in and so did the other Captaines hat cried vnto them they should do him no hurt. Cecima vnderstanding what the matter was, rode thither, and pacified the tumult of these men of armes; and then saluting Gelsus very courreoully, he went with him towards Bebriacym. But now Titianus in the meane time, repenting himfelf that he had fent Ambaffadors vnto the enemies, he placed the desperatest souldiers hehad vpon the wals of the citie, and incouraged the rest also to do the like, and to stand to the defence. But Cecinna came to the wall, and being on horse-backe, held vp his hand vnto them. Then they made no more refistance, but those that were vpon the wals, saluted the fouldiers; and they that were within the city opened the gates, and thrust in among & Vitellius men, who receiredthem, and didno man any hurt, but courteoufly imbraced them, and faluted each other. Then they all sware and tooke their oaths to be true to Vitellius, and so yeelded themselves vnto him. So do the most part of those that were at this battell, report the successe thereof: granting notwithstanding, that they knew not every thing that was done, because of the great disorder among them. But as I trauelled on a time through the field where the battell was striken, with file but Metrius Florus that had bene Confull, he shewed me an old man that when the field was fought tell know inthat place, was yong & against his will was at the same battel on Othoes part. Who told vs, that after the battel was fought, he came into the field to furuey the number of those that were dead: are done at and he found the dead bodies piled on a heape, of the height of those that came to view them. the battell, And faid moreouer, that he made inquirie of the matter, but he neither could imagine it himfelse, nor be satisfied by others. Now indeed it is likely, that in civill wars betweene countrimen of one selfe city, where one of the two armies is overthrown, that there shold be greater slaughteramong them, then against the other enemies, because they take no prisoners of either side: forthose they should take, would serue them to no good purpose. But after they were slaine, one to be layed on heapes fo by another, that is a hard thing to indge. But now to the matter. The news of this ouerthrow came first but obscurely vpon othe, a common thing in a matter of fo great importance: but afterwards, when some that were hurt came and brought him certaine newes of it, it was no maruell then to fee others friends & familiars to comfort him, who prayed him to be of good cheare, and not to be discouraged for that. Howbeit, the wonderfull great loue and good will which the private fouldiers shewed vnto him at that time, did passe and ex- The great ceedall speech and expectation. Then he came out, and they fell downe at his feete, as men represented in a triumph lying on the ground, & kissed his hands, with the teares running down their cheekes, and befought him notto for sake and leaue them to their enemies, but to command their persons whilest they had one drop of bloud left in their bodies to do him seruice. All of them together The won. made this petition to him. But amongst others, there was a poore foldier drawing out his sword, derfull faid vnto him: Know, ô Cafar, that all my companions are determined to die in this fort for thec, and vitto nim: Know, o Cofar, that all my companions are determined to die in this fort for thee, of a sould. & so slue himself. a flour countenance round about him, and casting his eyes every where, spake vnto them in this maner. I think this a more happy day for me, my fellowes, then that in the which you first chose me Emperor: to see you loue me so well, and do me such honor, with so great shew of loyalty. But yet I beseech you notto deny me of a greater fauour, which is: To die valiantly and honorably, for the safety of so many honest men as you be, and so good citizens of Rome. It by your election you made me worthy to take vpon me the Imperial crowne, I must now needs shew my selfe an Emperour, not sparing to spend my life for your and my countries safety. Iameertaine that the victorie is not altogether mine enemies. For newes are come vnto me, that our armies of Mysia and Pannonia are in their way coming to vs, and that they are not farre off from the Adriaticke sea. Asia, Syria, and Ægyer, & the legions that made warre with Ivry are all ours. The Senate taketh our part, and our enemies wives and children be in our hands. But this warre is not against Hannibal, nor Pyrrus, nor against the CIMBRES, to fight who should be owners of ITALIE: but it is against the ROMAINES themselves. For in this civill war, both the conquerour and vanquished do offend their countrey: for where the conquerours haue benefit, the countrey and commonwealth alwaies receiueth losse. Assure your selucs I had rather die then reigne Emperor: considering also that my life with victorie cannot so much benefite the Romain es, as the facrifice of the fame may do my countrey good, for the peace and quietnesse of my countrimen, keeping ITALIE thereby from seeing such another battellas this hath benc. So when he had made this oration vnto them, and put those by, that would have perfwaded him the contrary: he commanded all the Senatours and his friends that were prefent, to avoid. Then he wrote letters to them that were absent, and also vnto the cities wherethrough they passed, to vie them very courteously, and to see them safely conveyed. Then came his nephew Cocceius to him, who was yet but a young boy, and he did comfort him, and bad him not be afraid of Vitellius, for he had fafely kept his mother, wife, and children, and had bene as carefull of them, as if they had bene his owne: and that he would not yet adopt him for his sonne though he was defirous to doit, vntill fuch time as he faw the end of this warre: to the end that if he ouercame, he should quietly reigne Emperour with him: and if he were ouercome, that for adopting of him, he would not be cause of his death. But this one thing onely I command and charge thee, my fonne, euen as the last commandement that I can give thee that thou do not forget altogether, neither ouer-much remember, that thine Vncle hath bin Emperor. When he had told him this tale, he heard a noise at his doore: they were the fouldiers that threamed the Senators which came from him and would kill them, if they did not remaine with him, but would for fake their Emperor. Vpouthis occasion he came out once againe among them, being afraid leaft the fouldiers would do the Senators fome hurt, and made the foldiers give backe, not by intreating of them, nor speaking courteously to them, but looking grimly on them, and in great rage:infomuch that they all shrunke backe, and went away for feare. So when night came, he was athirst, and dranke a little water: and having two swords, he was proving a great while which had the best edge. In the end, he put by the one, and kept the other in his armes. Then he began to comfort his feruants, & liberally to give out his mony among them, to some more, to some lesse, not prodigally throwing it away without discretion, as being another mans mony: but discreetly gaue to enery man according to his desert. Then, after he had dispatched them away, he laid him downe to fleepe all the rest of the night, and the groomes of his chamber heard him fnort, he flept fo foundly. In the morning he called one of his enfranchifed bondmen, whom he had commanded to helpe to faue the Schators, and fent him to fee if they were all fafe, and gone. So when he understood that they were all gone, and that they had all they would: Come on, said he then vnto him, looke to thy felfe I reade thee, and take heed the souldiers see thee not, if thou wilt scape with life, for sure they will kill thee, thinking thou hast holpen me to kill my self. So, assoone as his enfranchised bondman was gone out of his chamber, he took his fword with both his hands, and setting the point of it to his breast, he fell down vponit, seeming to feele no other paine, fauing that he fetched a figh: whereby they that were without knew that he had done himselse hurt. Thereupon his friends made straight an out-cry, & all the campe and city was incontinently full of teares and lamentation. The fouldiers suddenly ranne with a great noise to his gates, where they bitterly bewailed, and lamented his death, falling out with themsclues that they were such villaines so slenderly to have guarded their Emperour, that they kept him nor from killing himselfe for their sakes. So there was not a man of them that left his body, though the enemies were hard at hand: but having honorably buried him, and prepared a great The fune. flacke of wood, they coueyed him armed to the fire of his funerals, every man thinking himself the she Empe. happie, that could first set his shoulders to the coffin to helpe to cary him. Others coming to it, ror. kneeled downe on their knees, and kiffed his wound. Others tooke and kiffed his hands. Others that could not come neare him honored him, and did reuerence him a farre off; and some there were also that after the stacke of wood was set on fire, slue themselves hard by the fire: who had never received benefit by him that was dead (at the least to any mans knowledge,) neither hadthey any occasion to be affraid of him that was conquerour. And truly me thinkes, neuer king nor tyrant was fo ambitioufly giuen to reigne, as they vehemently defired to be commanded by Otho, and to obey him: confidering that their defire left them not even after his death. but was so lively rooted in their minds, that in the end, it turned to a deadly hate vnto Vitellius. But of this we will speake more hereafter in time and place. Now, when they had buried others ashes, they did set vp a tombe for him, neither for magnificence of building, nor for glorious Ephaph, subject to enuy. For I haue seene his tombe in the city of BRESSELLES a meane thing, re Othors and the Epitaph vpon ittranslated out of Latine, saith no more but this: This is the tombe of tombe in Marcus Otho. He died being but seuen and thirtie yeares old, and was Emperour but three the citie of moneths: and there were as famous menthat commended his death, as they that reproued his life. For though he lived not much more honester then Nero, yet he died farre more hono- and reight rably. Furthermore, when Pollio one of the Captaines would have compelled his fouldiers prefently to haue taken their oathes to be true to Vitellius, they fell out with him; and ynder fanding that there were yet remaining some Senators, they would not medle with them, but onely troubled Verginius Rufus. For they came to his doores armed, and called him by his name, and commanded him to take charge of them, and to go as ambassador to intreate for them. Howbeit he thought it were but a fond part of him to take charge of them that were alreadie overcome, confidering he refused it when they had ouercome; and also he was afraid to go ambassador to the Germaines, because he had compelled them to do things against their wils. Therefore he went out at his backe-doore, and faued himselfe. So when the souldiers heard of it, they were at length contented to be brought to be fworne vnto Vitellius: and so ioyned themselves with Cecinnaes fouldiers, fo they might be pardoned for all that was past;

The end of Othoes life.

Hannibal.

F we do call to mind the first Punick war the Carthaginians had with the ROMAINES, we shall find many Captaines who by the glo-R rie of their noble deeds, haue left great fame and renowneymo their posteritic. Howbeit amongst all the Captaines of the CARTHAGI-NIANS, none are found more worthy of fame, and fo commended of all Greeke and Latine Authors, then Hamilear, Hamibals father, otherwise firnamed Barcha, a valiant man doubtlesse, and in his time a skilfull souldier as any was. The same Hamilear, first of all made warre with the ROMAINES, a longer time in Steller then was looked for. with the ROMAINES, a longer time in Sicile then was looked for,

who had done great hurt to his countrey and commonwealth. After that also in the warres of Africk E (at what time the mercenarie foldiers through their rebellion did put the country of CARTHAGE in great danger) he did so valiantly appeale the insurrection, that to enery mans iudgement, he was reputed the onely preserver of his countrey. Then he was sent Gouernour and Captaine into SPAINE, and caried with him at that time (as it is reported) his sonne Hannibal, being but a young boy, where he did noble service. In fine, in the ninth yeare of his aboade there in that prouince, he died fighting valiantly against the Vetheons. After his death, Hasarubal his sonne in law (whom the Carthaginians through the aide and friendship of the BARCINIAN faction had made Generall of all their armie) remained Gouernour there the space of eight yeares. This Hasdrubal sent for Hannibal into Spains, after his father Hamilears death, against y minds of the chiefe of the contrary faction; to the end that as he had bene trained from his youth in the discipline of wars, in his father Hamilears life: euen so in like manner, that now being come to mans state, he should the better harden his bodie, to away with the paines and dangers of the warres. Now although at the first, the remembrance of his father was a great helpe vnto him to winne the loue and good will of the fouldiers: yet he himselfe afterwards, through his diligence and industrie so handled the matter, that the old fouldiers forgetting all other Captaines, they only defired to choose him (and none other) for their governor, For they found in him all the perfections that could be wished for in a noble Thesharts Captaine or Generall. He had a present and readie wit to give counsell what was to be done, in position of greatest attempts: and besides, he lacked neither manhood nor industrie to put it in execu. tion. He had a valiant and innincible mind, even in greatest dangers and adversities of body: the which are wont to ftay others from performing their endeuors and dutie. He would watch and ward as any private foldier, and was quicke and ready to do any kind of service, either like a valiant fouldier, or a good Captaine. In this fort Hannibal continued in feruice in the warres, the space of three yeares, under the conduct of Hasdrubal. In that time he so wan the hearts of all the army, that immediatly after Haldrubals death, he was chosen to be Lieutenant generall, with the Hannibal common confent of all the fouldiers: and this honour was laid vpon him without contradiction of any of the Carthaginian s, through the friendship and good will of the Barcinian faction needs after than 1800 and on. Hannibal was now fixe and twentie yeares old, when the fouldiers made him their Lieutenant generall. For at what time his father Hamilear brought him into Spaine, he was then but being but ninc yeares old: and from that time vnto Hasdrubals death (according to Polybius declaration) it 26-geares was seuenteene yeares moe. So he was no sooner made Lieutenant generall of all the camp, and his countrey, but he bent himself to make war with § Romains: having long before determined it. For first of all, he chiefly maintained almost a common hate of all the CARTHAGINIANS against the Romaines, because of the losse of Sicile & Sandinia. Besides also, he bare the Diverseau. fecret malice in nature, as a thing inheritable from his father Hamilear; who of all the Captaines feef Hamthe CARTHAGINIAN'S cuer had, was the mortallest enemy vnto the Romaines. And it is writ- tall base to ten also, that at what time Hamilear made his preparation to go into Spain B, he compelled Han-the Re-nibal (being but a boy) to sweare in a sacrifice he made, that he would be a mortall enemy to the maines. ROMAINES, affoone as euer he came to the state of a man. So, the remembrance of these things were fill fresh in the yong mans mind, as the Idea (or Image) of his fathers hate, and fill prouoked him to spie out all the meanes he could, how to destroy the Empire of Rome. Besides also, the BARCINIAN faction neuer left to pricke him forward vnto it, because by wars he might raise The Rend. himselfe to greatnes, and so increase his estate. These causes, as well common as particular, inti- him sathe. ced Hannibal to attempt war against the Romaines, and gauethe sour yong man occasion by these means to practise innountio. There was a people at that time called y SAGVNTINES, who confined indifferently betwirt the Romaines & Carthaginians: and were left free by the former peace concluded. These Saguntines enerafter tooke part with the Romaines and by meanes of the league that was made betwixt them, the Romaines alwaies found the very true and faithfull to the Empire of Rome. Hannibal therefore thought with himselfe, he could not deuise to make a better match to anger the Romain Bs withal, & to kindle the fire of his malice also against them, then to make war with the SAGVNTINEs their confederates, Howbeir, before he would be openly seene to set vpon the, he first determined to leade his army against the OL-CADE s, and other people on the other fide of the river Iberus: and after he had overcome them, thento find occasion to molest the Saguntines, to make it appeare that the warre was rather begunne by them, then purposely intended by him. So after he had ouercome the OLCADES, he did set vpo the Vacceians, spoiled their country, besieged many cities, & took Herman-DICE, and ARBOCOLE, great and rich cities. Now he had in manner ouercome all the whole countrey, when diverse fugitives from the citie of HERMANDICE, encouraging one another, The confis conspired against him, leavied men, and inticed the OLCADEs that were sled, to take their part. racy of the Then they perswaded the CARTHAGINIANS their neighbours, that they would all agree sodainely to fet vpon Hannibal at his returne. They being a people that defired nothing more then to fight, and confidering also that they had received injuries by Hannibal, did eafily hearken vnto that counsell; and thereupon leauying a great number of men, to the number of a hundred thou-land, they went to assaile Hannibal at his returne from the VACCEIANS, by the river of Tagus. When the CARTHAGINIANS discoucred their army, they staied upon it, and were maruellously affraid. And doubtleffe they had had a great ouerthrow, if they had fought with those so fierce people, being affraid of their fodaine coming, and also loden as they were with so great spoiles: the which Hannibal deepely confidering, like a wife Captaine as he was, he would not fight, but lodged his campe in the place where they were. Then the next day following, he passed his armie ouer the river with as litle noise as he could, leaving the passage where the enemies might eafiliest come ouer, vnguarded: because vnder pretence of distembled seare, he might intice the barbarous people to passe ouer the river, to take the oportunity and occasion offered them. Now indeed as he was the fubtillest Captaine, and had the finest stratagemes of any other Captaine of his time: fo his policie was not in vaine, and his purpose to good effect, in abusing of the enemy: for the wild barbarous people reposing too great trust in the multitude of their men, suppofing the CARTHAGINIANS had bene affraid, with great furie entred the river to passe over it. So they being greatly troubled, & out of order by this meanes, and specially before they could passe all ouer the riner, they were set upon by the Carthaginians, first by certain horsmen. and afterwards with the whole army; fo that there was a great number of them flaine, and the refidue were put to flight. After this victory, all the people inhabiting about the river of Iberus, yeelded themselves vnto him, saving the Saguntines: who, though they saw Hannibal at hand coming towards them, trusting to the friendship of the Romaines, they prepared to defend themselues against him; and therewithall sent ambassadors presently to Rome, to shew the Senate in what great danger they were, & alfo to pray aide against their so great enemy, that made wars so hotely with them. The Ambassadours that were sent to Rome, were scant gone out of Spaine, when Hannibal made open war on them with all his army, & pitched his camp before the city of Saguntus. When this matter was reported at Rome, and confulted of for the wrongs that had bin done to their confederates, the Senators dealt but flackly in it, & by decree only sent P. Valerius Flaccus, and Quintus Bebius Pamphilus vnto Hannibal, to will him to raise his fiege from Sagunty s: and if they found he would not hearken to them, that then they should thence repaire to CARTHAGE, & to pray them to deliuer their generall Hannibal vnto them, because he had broken y peace. Polybius writeth, that Hannibal did hearethese ambassadors, howbeit, that he made the a slender answer. Linius writeth in contrary maner, that they were neuer heard, nor came at any time to his camp. Howbeit, they both agree thus far, that they came into Spaine, & afterwards went into Africke, & from thence came to Carthage, where after they had delivered their message vnto the Coucel, the Barcinian faction was so much against them, that they dishonourably returned to Rome, and obtained not their defire. Now in the Senate of CARTHAGE there were two contrary parts and factions: of the which, the first took his beginning from the gouernment of Hamilear, furnamed Barea, & so descended as it were by succeffió to his fon Hannibal, and grew afterwards ynto fuch greatnesse, that that faction (as well abroad as at home)ruled all matters indicial. The second faction came of Hanno, a grane man and of great authority in the same commonwealth howbeir, a man more given to imbrace peace & quietnes, then otherwise disposed to war and trouble. It is he only (as it is reported) who at that time when the Ambassadors of the Romains came to Carthage, to coplaine of the iniuries done to their confederates, that did then in maner against the will of all the whole Senate, counfell them to keep peace with the Romain's, & to beware of wars, the which one day might peraductione veterly destroy their country. Doubtlesse, if the CARTHAGINIANS would have followed the grave counsell of Hanno, rather then to have given place to their defires, and had followed the author of peace, and not to have bene ruled by them that gaue counsell to make warres, they had not tafted of those miseries which their countrey afterwards came vnto:butgiuing place to the fury and ambitious mind of a yong man, they heaped fuch mischiefes on their heads, as afterwards fell out vponthem. Therfore it is very meete for wife magistrates & gouernors of comonweales, alwaies rather to haue an eye to the beginning of any matters, then to the end; & euer to decide all matters by aduice & counfel, before they should take any wars in hand. Now the SAGVNTINE s feeing themselves besieged by Hannibal, & that against alreason & equitie he made wars vpon them, they notwithstanding valiantly defended the siege many moneths together. Yet in fine, though Hannibal had many mo men then they (having a hundred and fiftie thousand men in his camp) & that the most part of their rampars were battered & ouerthrown: they liked rather to abide the facke of their citie, then to yeeld themselues to the mercie of their

mortall enemy. So some do report, that SAGVNTVS was taken the eight moneth after fiege was Hamiltal laid vnto it. But Line seemeth not to agree to that, neither to set downe any certaine time of the continuance of the fiege. Now the taking of this lo wealthy a city, was a great furtherance di- gamus, uerfe waies to Hannibals enterprifes. For many cities taking example of the facke of SA GV NTV s. who before misliking to be subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, were ready to rebell, keptthem felues quiet, and the fouldiers also waxed lively and couragious: feeing the rich spoiles that were divided in the campe. So Hannibal fent great prefents of the spoiles of the SAGVNTINES. vnto Carthage, whereby he wan the chiefest men of the city, and made them like the better ofwarres: whom he determined to leade with him against the ROMAINES, not in SPAINE, as many supposed but into ITALY it selfe. Whilest these matters were in hand, the Ambassadors returned from Carthags to Roms, and declared in open Senate, the flender answer they had received in maner at the felfe fametime when they had intelligence of the facke of SAGV STVS; Hercupon the Romains greatly repented themselves (though somewhat too late) for that they aided not their friends & confederates in fo great a danger. Therefore all the Senate and people together, being very fory for it, and therewith also maruellously offended, they deuided the provinces vnto the Confuls, to wit, SPAINE vnto Publius Cornelius, and AFRICKE and SICILE P. Cornelius also vnto Titus Sempronius. Afterwards, certaine of the noblest men of the city were sent Ambaffadors vnto Carthage, to make their complaints in open Senate for breach of the peace, Conful. and also to denounce vnto them the cause of the warre to come, and therewith boldly to pro-claime open warre against them, after they had declared the occasion thereof to come of themselues. This was as brauely received of the CARTHAGINIANS, as lustily offered vnto them; but maines, therein they were not fo well adulfed, as the fuccesse of that war in the end sufficiently proued it with the to them. Now Hannibal being advertised how things were concluded in the Senate at CAR-THAGE, and thinking with himselfe that it was time to go into ITALY, as he had determined from the beginning: he made all the possible speed he could to prepare his ships and things readie and so required aide of the cities that were his best friends and confederates, and commanded that all the bands should meete him at new CARTHAGE. So when he came to GADES, he appointed good garrifons in places most concenient, in Africk & Spaine, which he thought aboue all things effeto be most necessary: because that when he should go into ITALY, the Ro-MAINS should not win it from him. Therfore he sent into Africk twelue hundred horsemen. and thirteene thou sand footmen, all Spaniards; and besides, he brought out of diverse parts of Africk fourethousand soldiers, & placed them in garrison in Carthage, obtaining both hostages and fouldiers by this meane. So he left the government of Spains to his brother Hafdrubal, and gaue him an army of fifty thips of warre, two thousand horsemen, and twelue thoufand footmen. These were the garritons he left in both those provinces. Now he thought them not sufficient to with stand the power of the Romains, if they bent their wars into Spains or AFRICKE: but he thought them strong enough to stay the enemy from ouerrunning of the country, vntill that having brought his army by land, he had fet foot in ITALY. Moreover, he knew that the CARTHAGINIAN'S were firong enough to leavie a new army if they lifted; and if need fo required, to fend him aide also into ITALY. For after that they had driven away this fo dangerous a warre, procured against them through the spice of the mercenary souldiers, having cuer after obtained victory: first under the conduct of Hamilear: secondly, under Hasdrubal: and lastly, under Hannibal: they were growne to such greatnesse and strength, that at what time Hannibal came into Italy, their Empire and dominions were maruelloufly enlarged. For they had all the coast of Africk, which lieth ouer against the sea Mediterraneum, from the alters of the Philenians, which be not farre from the great Syrte, vito Hercules pillars, and containeth in Integretation and Containeth and Con length * two thousand paces. So after they had passed the straight which deuideth Africks dominion of from EVROPE, they possessed almost all Spaine, to the mountaines Pirenei, which do deuide *This place SPAINE from GAVLE. Thus order being taken for all things in Africk E and Spaine, Hanni- "faile. bal returned againe to new CARTHAGE, where his army was ready for him, and well appointed. So, meaning to delay time no longer, he called his mentogether, and encouraging them with great and large promifes, he greatly commended the commodities of ITALY: and made Hannibal great account vnto them of the friendship of the GAVLES, and in the end bad them be of good determinesh courage, and set lustily forward. Thereupon, the next day following he departed from CAR- to insade THAGE, and brought his army all along the coast, vnto the river of Iberus. It is reported, that the

HANNIBAL: nextday following, Hannibal dreamed he faw a yong man, of a maruellous terrible looke and frature, who bad him follow him into ITALY: but afterwards, that he faw a fnake of a wonderfull greatnesse, making a maruellous noise and being desirous to vnderstad what the same might fignific, that it was told him, that it betokened the destruction of ITALIE. It is not to be marnelled at, though the great care and thought he tooke in the day time for the warre of ITALY, made his mind to run of fuch fancies in the night, as dreaming of victory or destruction, or such other calamities of war. For they are things that happen often, as Cicero the Orator faith: that our thoughts and words do beget such things in our dreame, as Ennius the Poet writeth of Homerito wit, like to those his mind most ran on, or that he talked of most. Now after Hannibal had passed ouer the mountaines Pirenei, and that he had won the GAVLES hearts with bountifull gifts, in few daies he came to the river of Rhone. The head of the river of Rhone, is not farre from the heads of the rivers of the Rhein and Danuby, and running eight hundred furlongs, it falleth into Lacus Lemanus at Geneva. Then it runneth from thence towards the west, and devideth the GAVLES a pretie way: and then being increased by the river of Arar (called in French, Saone) & with other rivers, in the end it falleth into the fea with divers heads betwixt the Volses & the CAVARIANS. The VOLSCES at that time inhabited both the fides of yriver of Rhone, & were full of people, and the richest of all other GAVLES. They having vnderstanding of Hannibals coming, passed ouer the river, and armed themselves, and prepared on the other side to stoppe the CARTHAGINIANS, that they should not pusse ouer. Now, though Hannibal had wonall the other GAVLES, yet those he could neuer win neither by gifts nor threates, to cause them ratherto proue the friendship of the CARTHAGINIANS, then their force. Therefore Hamibal perceiuing he was to handle such enemies rather by policy, he commanded Hanno the sonne of Bomilear, fecretly to passe ouer the river of Rhone, with part of the army, and so to set vpon the GAVLES on the fodaine. Thereupon Hanno (as he was commanded) made a long journey, and having passed ouer the riner at passable footds, he showed himselfe hard by the enemies campe before they faw him, or that they knew what he was. The GAVLs hearing their shouts &cries behind them, and having their hands full of Hannibal before them, who had many boats ready to paffe ouer his men they having no leifure to confult of the matter, neither to armetheselues to stand to defence, left their campe and fled for life. So they being driven from the other fide of the riuer, the rest of the army of the CARTHAGINIANS passed ouer it with safetie. In the meanetime, P. Cornelius Scipio, that but a litle before was come vnto Massilia, still heard newes of Hannibals armie. Wherefore, to be more affured of the matter, he sent a band of choise horsemen to disconer what the enemies intent was: who making great speed as they were commanded, met by chance with fine hundred horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, whom Hannibal had also sent to bring him word of the ROMAINES army. So, they first sodainly gaue charge vpon the Numi-DIANS, and after a hote and valiant conflict betweene both the parties, in the end the Romains ouercoming them, they made them flic, but with great losse of their men: howbeit the greatest losseand slaughter fell vpon the enemies. So Hannibal by this meanes found where the Ro-MAINES lay, and stood in a great doubt with himselfe, whether he should keepe on his way into ITALIE, or else lead his armie against the Consul that then was, and so to proue his hap & successe. At length debating many wayes in his mind, and vncertaine which way he should determine, the Ambaffadors of the Botans perswaded him to leaue all other deuises, & togo on into Italie. For before that Hannibal had passed ouer the mountains Pirenei, the Boians having by craft taken the Romains Ambassadors, and done great mischiefe vnto Manlius the Prætor, and intifed the Insubrians also, they were revolted from the Romaines, & tooke part with Hannibal, and onely because the ROMAINS had replenished the cities of PLACENTIA, & CRE-MONA with people, and had made the Colonies to Rome. So Hannibal being ruled by their counsell, raised his campe, and keeping the rivers side, still going against the river in few daies he came to the place which the GAVLE's docall the Iland, the which the river of Arar and Rhodanus, coming from diuers mountaines, do make there. So at this present, there is the samous citie of Lions in Gavie, which they fay was built long time after by Plancus Munatius. Fro thence he came to the country of the Allobrooks, & having pacified the variance betwixt two brethren for the Realme, he came through the countrey of the Castinians and Vocontians, to the riuer of Durance. The head of this riuer cometh from the Alpes, and from thence running with a swift streame, salleth into the riner of Rhone: & as it oftentimes changeth her course so hath it in manner no passable foord. Yet Hannibal having past it over, he led his army vnto the Alpes, through open and plaine countries, as farre as he could: howbeit, as he passed through them, he had great losses, as it is reported. Infomuch that some that were living at that time, did affirme, that they heard Hannibal himselfe say, that he had lost about thirtie thousand men, and the most part of his horsemen. For he was forced not oney to fight with the inhabitants of the Hamilbal mountaines, but also compelled to make wayes through the straights: so that in certaine places made waies of the highest rockes, he was driven to make passages through, by force of fire and vineger. So when he had passed the Alpes in fifteene dayes space, he came downe into the valley, not farre mountainet from the citic of TVRINE. Whereby it feemeth to me, that he passed ouer the mountaine they by force of commonly called Genua, the which on the one fide of it hath the river of Druentia, and on the pinegar. other side it goeth down to v city of Tyrine. Now it is hard to say truly, what number of men The valley he had when he was come into ITALIE, because of the diversitie of mens opinions. For some of Turinus Hamibals write, that he had a hundred thousand footmen, and twenty thousand horsemen; others also coming in write, that he had twentie thousand footemen, and fixe thousand horsemen, all Africans and to Haly by Spaniards. But others reckoning the Gavles and Ligrrians, do count four escore thoufand footemen, and ten thousand horsemen. Yet it is not credible, that his army was so great, as from Two the first men report, and specially having passed through so many countries, and also received rine. fich loffe as he had neither also could his number be so small, as the second reporters do make ir. if a man will confider the famous exploits and great enterprifes he did afterwards. So that I like their opinions best, which keepe the meane betweene them both: considering that he brought into ITALIE, the better part of fourescore thousand footenen, and ten thousand hors- Haunibale) men, the which he had leuied in Spaine: as it is manifestly knownealso, that a great number army in of the Ligyrians and Gavies came to joyne with him, for the great malice they bare vnto the ROMAINES, that gaue no place nor ground vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. So Hannibal being come from TVRINE, into the countrey of the INSVERIANS, he was met withall by Public Cornelius Scipio, who marching with wonderfull speede from Massilia, and having passed the riuers of Po and Tefin, he camped not farre from the enemy. So shortly after, both the Generals being come into the field to view each others campe, the horsemen of either fide grew to skir- Hannibals mish, which continued long, and was not to be discerned which of them had the better. How- free conbeit, in the end the Romaines feeing the Confull hurt, and also that the horsemen of the Nv-MIDIANS, by litle and litle came to compasse them in, they were drivento give ground; and so maines, and pretily retired, defending the Conful the best they could to saue him, and so at length recoursed their campe. It is reported, that Publius Cornelius Scipio was faued at that time through his fons confull helpe, who afterwards was called African, and at that time was but a young strippling; whose but, and praife, thoughit was wonderfull in so greene a youth, yet it is likely to be true, because of the bis enemies famous and valiant acts that he did afterwards. Now Scipio having prooued how much his e- by his ion, nemie was stronger then himselse in horsemen, he determined to place his campe so, as his footmen might be inbest safetie, and also fight with greatest advantage. And therefore the next falled Anight following he passed the river of Po, & made as little noise as he could, and went vnto PLA- trican. CENTIA. The like shortly after did T. Sempronius Longus, who had bene restored fro banishment by the Senate, and sent for out of Sicil E: because both the Consuls should gouerne the comon scipic and wealth by one selfe authoritie. Hannibal also followed them both with all his armie, and pitched T. Semprohis campe neare vnto the river of Trebia, hoping that because both camps lay so neare together, eus consuls. fome occasion would be offered to fight: the which he chiefly defired, both because he could not against long maintaine war for lacke of victuals, as also that he mistrusted the ficklenes of the GAVLES; who like as they soone fell in league and friendshippe with him, drawne vnto it with hope of change, and with the fame also of his victorie obtained; so he mistrusted that vpon any light occasion (as if the war should continue any long time in their countrey) they would turne all the hate they bare vnto the ROMAINES, against him as the onely author of this warre. For these respectstherefore, he deuised all the meanes he could to come to battell. In the meane time Sem-Pronius the other Confull met with a troupe of the enemies, loden with spoile, straggling vp and downethe fields, whom he charged and put to flight. So, imagining the like successe of all the battell, by this good fortune he had met withall, he had good hope of victorie, if once both thearmies might come to fight. Therefore being maruellously desirous to do some nobleenterprise before Scipio were recourred of his hurt, and that the new Confull should be chosen, he determined to joyne battell against the will of his other colleague & fellow Conful Scipio; who thought nothing could be to leffe purpose, then to put all the state and commonwealth in icopardie, specially having all the whole GAVLES in maner in the field against him. Now Hamibal had fecret intelligence of all this variance, by fpials he had fent into the enemies campe. Wherefore, he being politicke and fubtill as he was, found out a place straight betweene both campes. concredoner with bushes and briers, and there he placed his brother Mago to lie in ambush, with a company of chosen men. Then he commanded the horsemen of the NVMIDIANS, to scurre to the trenches of the Romains, to intice them to come to battell; and thereupon made the refidue of his army to eatc, and so put them in very good order of battell, to be readie vpon any oc. casion offered. Now the Consull Sempronius, at the first tumult of the NVMIDIANS, sodainely fent his horfemen to encounter them, and after them put out fixe thousand footmen, and in the end came himselfe out of his campe with all his armie. It was then in the middest of winter, and extreme cold, and specially in the places inclosed about the Alpes, and the mountaine Appenine. Now the NVMIDIAN'S as they were commanded, inticed the ROMAINES by litle and litle on this side the river of Trebia, vntil they came to the place where they might discerne their enfignes: and then they fuddenly turned vpon the enemics which were out of order. For it is the manner of the NVMIDIANS, oftentimes to flie of set purpose, and then to stay vponthe sodaine when they fee time, to charge the enemic more hotely and fiercely then before. Whereupon Semprenius incontinently gathered his horsemen together, and did set his men in battell ray, as time required, to give charge vpon his enemie, that stayed for him in order of battell. For Hannibal had cast his men into squadrons, ready upon any occasion. The skirmish beganne first by the light horsemen, and afterwards increased hoter by supply of the men of armes; howbeit, the ROMAINE Knights being vnable to beare the shocke of the enemies, they were quickly broken; fo that the legions maintained the battell with fuch furie and noble courage, that they had bene able to have refifted, fo they had fought but with footmen only. But on the one fide, the horsemen and Elephants made them affraid, and on the other fide the footemen followed them very Infilly, and fought with great furie against famished and frozen men. Whereforethe ROMAINS notwithstanding, suffering all the miseries that vexed them on every side, with an vnspeakeable courage and magnanimitie, such as was about their force and strength, they fought still, vntill that Mago coming out of his ambush, came and sodainly assailed them with great shoutes and cries; and that the middle fquadron of the CARTHAGINIAN's also (through Hamibals commandement) flew vponthe CINOMANIANS. Then the ROMAINES feeing their confederates flie, their hearts were done, and vtterly discouraged. It is said that there were ten thousand footmen of the Romains gotto Placentia, and came through the enemies. The rest of the army that fled, were most part of them slaine by the Carthaginians. The Confull Sempronius also scaped very narrowly from the enemies. The victory cost Hannibal the setting on also for helost a great number of his men, and the most part of his Elephants were slaine. After this battell, Hanaibal ouercame all the countrie, and did put all to fire and fword, and tooke also certaine townes: and with a few of his men made a great number of the countrimen flie, that were disorderly gathered together in battel. Then at y beginning of the Spring, he brought his army into the field fooner then time required: & meaning to go into THV s CAN, he was driven backeby a great tepest at the very top of the height of Appenine, and so compelled to bring his army about PLA-CENTIA: howbeit, shortly after he put himselfe again into the fields for divers vrgent & necessarie causes. For had he not saued himself by that policie, he had almost bene taken tardie by the ambush of the GAVLES: who being angry with him that the war cotinued so long in their country, they fought to be reuenged of him, as the only author & occasion of the war. Therfore perceiuing it was time for him to avoid this danger, he made all the hast he could to lead his army into some other provinces. Furthermore, he thought it wold increase his estimation much among strangers, and also greatly encourage his owne people, if he could make the power of the Car-THAGINIANS to seeme so great, and also their captaine to be of so noble a courage, as to dare to make war so neare to y city of Rome. All things therfore set a part, he marched with his campe by the mountaine Appenine, and so coming through the countrey of the LIGVRIANS, he camo into Thys can, by the way that bringeth the into the champion countrey, & to the marishes about the river of Arnus. The river of Arnus at that time was very high, & had overflowne al the fields thereabouts. Hannibal therefore marching with fo great an armie as he had, could not anoidit, but that he must needs lose a number of his men and horse, before he could get out of those cuill-fauoured marishes. Insomuch that he himselfe lost one of his eyes, by reason of the great paines he had taken day and night without fleepe or rest, and also through the euill aire: lost one of though he was caried upon a high Elephants backe, which onely was left him of all that he had brought with him. In the meanerime, C. Plaminius Confull, to whom the charge of Sempronius bitheriner armie was giuen, he was come vnto Aretiv Magainst the Senates mind, who were maruellously offended with him, because he left his companion Cn. Seruilius at Rome, and went vnto his prouince by stealth as it were, without the furniture of a Consull & his officers. This was a very serviture, haltie man of nature, & one that the people had brought to that dignitie & office: so that he was compile. become so proud & insolent, that men might see how he wold hazard all things without wit or indgement, Hannibal having intelligence thereof, thought it the best way to anger the Consull, and to do what he could possible to allure him into the field, before his fellow Consull should come to joyne with him. Therefore he marching forward with his campe through the countrey of Fesula Aretiumshe burnt & spoiled all the country thereabouts, and filled them all with feare, never leaving to destroy all before him, vntill he came to the mountains Cortonenses, and Montes foto the lake called Thrasimene. When he had viewed the place he went about to surprise his Cortoners. enemic by some ambush: whereupon he conveyed certaine horsemen under the hils, hard by the firaight that goeth vnto Thrasimene, and behind the mountaines also he placed the light horsemen. Then he himselfe with the rest of his army came downe into the field, supposing that the Confull would not be quiet; and fo it fell out. For hote stirring heads are easily intrapped, & fall Theindge. into the enemies ambush, and oftentimes do put all in hazard, because they will follow no counfelnor good aduice. C. Flaminius therfore feeing their country veterly spoiled, the corne destroy. td & cut downe, & the houses burnt, he made great hast to lead his army against the enemy contrary to all mens minds, who would have had him taried for his copanion Cn. Servilius the other Conful. So euen at Sun fer, when he was come to the straights of the lake of Thrasimene, he caused his campe to stay there, although his men were not wearie with the long journey they had taken by the way. So the next morning by break of day making no view of the country, he went ouer the mountaines. Then Hannibal, (who long before was prepared for this) did but stay for the oportunitie to worke his feate: when he faw the Romaine s come into the plaine, he gaue a fignall vnto all his men to give charge vpon the enemy. Therupon the CARTHAGINIAN's brea- Battell beking out on every fide, came before and behind, and on the flankes to affaile the enemie, being wint Hanthut in betweene the lake and the mountaines. Now in contrary manner, the Romaines, be- and c.Fla. ginning to fight out of order, they fought inclosed together, that they could not see one another, as if it had benedarke: so that it is to be wondered at, how, and with what minde they Confill, by fought it out fo long confidering they were compaffed in on every fide. For they fought it out Thraffabout three houres space, with such furie and courage, that they heard not the terrible earthquake that was at that present time, neither did they offer to flie or stirre a footivntil they heard The Rethat the Consull C. Flaminius going from ranke to ranke to encourage his men, was slaine by aman of armes called Ducarius. Then when they had lost their Generall, and being voide of all hope, they fled, some towards the mountaines, and others towards the lake, of the which diuerse of them flying, were ouertaken and slaine. So there were slaine * fifteene thousand in the the noise of field, and there scaped about ten thousand. Furthermore, the report went, that there were fixe thousand footemen which forcibly (at the beginning of the battell) got to the mountaine, and c. Flaminius therestayed on a hill till the battell was ended, and at length came downe vpon Hannibals pro- the confull, mise:butthey were betrayed, and slaine enery mothers some of them. After this great victorie, plaine. Hannibal did let divers ITALIAN prisoners go free without ransome paying, after he had vied in the life them maruellous courteously because that the fame of his clemency & curtesie should be known of Fabius vnto all nations, wheras indeed his own nature was contrary to all vertues. For he was hafty and addebted cruell of nature, and from his youth was brought vp in wars, and exercised in murther, treason as many and ambushes laid for enemies: and neuer cared for law, order, nor civill government. So by prisoners. this meanes he became one of the cruellest Captaines, the most subtile and crastiest to deceive eraftines to and intrap his enemie, that euer was. For as he was alway prying to beguile the enemy, fo those diffemble whom he could not ouercome in war by plaine force, he went about to intrap by fleight & policy. The which appeareth true by this present battel, and also by the other he fought against the rai dispus-Confull Sempronius, by the river of Trebia. But let vs returne to our matter, and leave this talke sion of Hat

till another time. Now when the newes of the ouerthrow & death of the Confull Flaminius was reported at Rome, having lost the most part of his army: there was great moane and lamentation made through all the city of Rome bewailing the common miserie of the comonwealth. others lamenting their private particular losse, & some also forowing for both together. But in. deed it was a wofull fight, to see a world of men & women to runto the gates of the city, enery one prinately asking for their kin & friends. Some do write, that there were two women, who being very fory & penfiue, despairing of the safetic of their sons, died sodainly for the extreme iov they had, when beyond their expectation and hope they faw their fons aliue & fafe. At the felfe fame rime, Cn. Seruilius, the other Confull with C. Flaminius, did fend him 4000 horsemen, not vnderstanding yet of the battel that was fought by the lake of Thrasimene. But when they heard of the ouerthrow of their men by the way, & therefore thought to have fled into VMERIA, they were copaffed in by the horfmen of the enemies, & fo brought vnto Hannibal. Now the Empire of Rome being brought into so great extremity, & danger, because of somany small osses one in the necke of another: it was ordained, that an extraordinary Gouernor or Magistrate should be chosen, who should be created Dictator: an office specially vsed to be referred for the last hope and remedy in most extreme danger & perill of the state & comonwealth. But because the Cofull Servitius could not returne at that time to Rom B, all the waies being kept by the enemy; the people contrary to their custome, created Q. Fabius Dictator, (who afterwards attained the surname of Maximus, to fay, Very great) who likewife did name M. Minutius Generall of the horfmen. Now this Fabius was a grave & wife counfeller, and of great authority, & estimation in the comonwealthinfomuch as the citizens had all their hope & condence in him only, perswading theselues, that the honor of Rome might be better preserved under the government & conduct offuch a Generall, rather then under the gouernment of any other man what soener. So Fabius knowing it very well, after he had carefully & diligently ginen order for all things necessary the departed from RomE, and when he had received the army of the late Consull Cn. Serutlius, he added vnto them two other legions, and so went vnto the enemy. Now Hannibal was gone from the lake of Thrasimene, and went directly towards the city of Spoleton, to see if he could take it at the first affault. But when he saw that the townes-men stood vpo the rampiers of their wals, and valiantly defended themselues: he then left the rowne and destroyed the countrey as he went, and burnt houses and villages, and so went into Apvlia, through the marches of Anco-NA, and the country of the MARSIANS and PELIGNIANS. The Dictator followed himatthe hecles, and camped hard by the city of ARPY, not farre from the campe of the enemy, to the end to draw out the war at length. For the rashnesse and foole-hardines of the former Captains aforetime, had brought the state of Rome into such miserie, that they thought it a victorievnto them, not to be our come by the enemy, that had so often our come them. Whereby all things were turned straight with the change and alteration of the Captaine: for though Hannibal had fet his men in battell ray, and afterwards perceiuing his enemies stirred not, went and destroyed the countrey, hoping thereby to intice the Dictator to fight, when he should see the country of his confederates fo ipoiled, as it was before his face the Dictator, this not with standing, was not mooued withall, but still kept his men close together, as if the matter had not concerned him. Hannibal was in a maruellous rage with the delay of the Dictator, and therefore often remoued his campe, to the end that going diverse wayes, some occasion or oportunitic might fall out to deceiue the enemy, or else to giue battell. So when he had passed the mountaine Appenine, he came vnto Samnivm. But because shortly after, fome of Campania, who having bene taken prisoners by the lake of Thrasimene, had bin set at liberty without ransome: they putting him in hope that he might take the city of CAPVA, he made his army march forward, and took a guide that knew the countrey, to bring him vnto Casinvm. Now the guide ouerhearing Casinvm, vnderstood it Casilinum, and so mistaking the sound of the word, brought the army a cleane contrary way vnto Calentinum and Calenum, & frothence about Stella. So when they came into a countrey enuironed about with mountaines & rivers, Hannibal knew straight they had mistaken their way, and so did cruelly put the guideto death. Fabius the Dictator, did in the meane time beare all this patiently, and was contented to give Hannibal libertie to take his pleafure which way he would, vntill he had gotten the mountaines of Gallicanum, and Casilinum, to death by where he placed his garrison, being places of great aduantage and commoditie. So the armie, of the Carthaginians was in manner compassed in enery way, and they must needes have died for famine in that place, or else haue fled, to their great shame and dishonour had not Hansihal by this stratageme prevented the danger. Who knowing the danger all his armic stood in, Hannibals and having spied a fit time for it: he commanded his souldiers to bring foorth two thousand fratagement oxen which they had gotten in spoile in the fieldes, having great store of them, and then tying in the mon tains of torches of fire-linkes vnto their hornes, he appointed the nimblest men he had to light them, & Gallicanti to drive the oxen up the hill to the toppe of the mountaines, at the reliefe of the first watch. All and Cafile this was duely executed according to his commandement, and the oxen running vp to the toppe of the mountaines with the torches burning, the whole armie marched after them faire D. Stater. and foftly. Now the ROMAINES that had long before placed a strong garrison vpon the mountaines, they were affraid of this strange fight, and mistrusting some ambush, they foorthwith forsooke their peeces and holdes. Fabius himselfe mistrusting also that it was some stratageme of the enemy, kept his men within the campe, and could not well tell what to fay to it. In the cereaine meane time Hannibal got ouer the mountaine, not farre from the bathes of Swessa, which the baths at countrimen do call, The tower of the bathes, and brought all his army safe into ALBA: and led the fortly after, he marched directly as though he would go to Rom B, howbeit he fuddenly turned tower of the out of the way, and went presently into Apvlia. There he tooke the citie of GLERENVM, a veryrich and wealthy towne, where he determined to winter. The Dictator followed him hard, sing in aand came and camped by LAVRINY M, not farre from the CARTHAGINIAN'S camp. So he being fulls. fent for to Rome about weightie affaires of the state, there was no remedie, but that he must needes depart from thence with all the speede he could: how beit before he went, he left Marcus Minutius Generall of the horsemen, his Lieutenant of all the armic, and commanded him inhis absence not once to stir nor to meddle with the enemies. For he was fully bent to follow his determination, which was: not to vexe the enemie, nor to fight with him, though he were pronoked vnto it. Howbeit Marcus Minutins litle regarding the Dictators commandement, his backe was no sooner turned, but he set vpon a companie of the enemies dispersed in the field a foraging, and flue a great number of them, and fought with the rest even vnto their campe. The rumor of this skirmish flew straight to Rome, and there was such great account made of it, that it was effeemed for a victorie: and the common people were so joyfull of it, that they straight made the power of the Lieutenant equall with the Dictator Fabius, the which was never heard of before. Fabius patiently bearing this extreme iniurie with a noble courage, having no way deserued it, he returned againe into the campe. Thus there were two Dictators at one selse time. Two Dictators (athing neuer feene nor heard of before) who after they had deuided the army betweene the, there were either of them commanded his armie apart, as the Consuls were wont to do before. Marcus heard of be-Minutius thereupon grew to fuch a pride and haughtie mind, that one day he ventured to give fore. battel, and made not his companion Fabius of counfell with all: the which Hannibal having fo often ouercome, durst scantly have enterprised. So he led his armie into such a place, where the enemichad compassed them in: insomuch that Hannibal slue them at his pleasure, without any hopeleft them to escape, if Fabius had not come in time (as he did) to aide them, rather respecting the honour of his countrey, then remembring the private injurie he had received. For he comming fresh with his armie to the battell, made Hannibal affraid, that the Romaine legions had libertieto retire with fafetie. Whereby Fabius wan great fame for his wisdome and valiantnesse; both of his owne fouldiers, as also of the enemies themselves. For it was reported that Hannibal should fay (returning into his campe,) That in this battell he had ouercome M. Minutius, but withall, that he was also our come by Fabius. And Minutius himself also confessing Fabius wisedome, and confidering that (according to Hesiodus saying) it was good reason to obey a better manthen himselse: he came with all his army vnto Fabius camp, and renouncing his authoritie, came and humbly falured Fabius as his father, and all that day there was greatioy, and reioyeing among the fouldiers, So both the armies being placed in garrison for the winter time, after great contention about it, at length there were two new Confuls created, L. Paulus Amylius, and C. and c.re-Terentius Varro, one that of a meane man (through the fauour of the common people) was rentus brought to be Confull. So they had libertie and commission to leavie a greater army then the Generals beforethem had done. Whereby the legions were newly supplied, and also others ad. The diffeded vnto them, more then were before. Now when the Consuls were come into the armie, as they were of seuerall dispositions, so did they also observe diverse manners in their government. fashions: he did desire to draw out the warre in length, and to stay the enemy without fighting. Varro on the other fide was a hasty man, and venturous, and defired nothing but to fight. So it chanced, that not long after it was knowne, to the great cost and danger of the citie of Rome. what difference there was betwixt the modestie of Amylius, and the foole-hardinesse of Varro. For Hamibal being affraid of some stir and rumult in his campe for lacke of victuals, he departed from CLERENYM, and going into the warmelt place of APVLIA, came and camped with all his armie, by a village called CANNES. So he was followed with both the Confuls, who came and camped feuerally hard by him, but so neare one to another, that there was but the river of Aufide that parted them. This river (as it is reported) doth alone devide the mountaine of the Appenine, and taketh his head on that fide of the mountaine that lyeth to the sea side, from whence it runneth to the sea Adriaticum. Now Lucius Paulus finding that it was impossible for Hannibal being in a strange countrey, to maintaine so great an armie of such sundrie nations together: he was fully bent to protract time, and to avoid battell, perswading himselfe that it was the right and onely way to ouercome him, being as much to the enemies disaduantage, as also maruellous profitable and beneficiall for the common wealth. And sure if C. Terentius Varre, had caried that minde, it had bene out of all doubt, that Hannibals armie had bene ouerthrowne by the ROMAINES, without stroke striking. Howbeit he had such a light head of his owne, and was so fickle minded, that he neither regarded wife counsell, nor Paulus Amylius authoritie: but in contrary manner would fall out with him, and also complained before the fouldiers, for that he kept his men pent vp and idle, whileft the enemie did put foorth his men to the field in battell ray. So when his turne came, that he was absolutely to command the whole armie, for they had both absolute power by turnes) he passed ouer the river of Auside by breake of day, and gaue the fignall of battell without the privitie of his companion Amylius, who rather followed him against his will then willingly, because he could do none otherwise. So he caused a scarlet coat of armes to be put out very earely in the morning, for a signall of battell. Hannibal on the other fide being as glad of it as might be possible, that he had occasion offered him to fight: (considering that the continual delaying of battell did alter all his purpose) he passed his army ouer the river, and had straight put them in very good order. For he had taken great spoiles of his enemies to furnish himselfe very brauely. Nowthe armie of the ROMAINES stood South-ward, infomuch that the South winde (which the men of the countrey call Vulturnus) blew full in their faces: whereas the enemies in contrarie maner had the vantage of the winde and Sunne vpon their backes, and their battell stood in this manner. The Africans were placed in both the wings, and the GAVLES and SPANIARDS set in a squadron in the middest. The light horsemen first begannethe skirmish, and after them followed the men of armes: and because the space betwixt the river and the sootemen was very narrow, so as they could not well take in any more ground, it was a cruell fight for the time, though it lasted not long. So, the horsemen of the Romaine's being ouerthrowne, the footemen came with such a lustie courage to receive the charge, that they thought they should not haue day enough to fight. Howbeit, the ouer-earnest desire they had to ouercome their enemies, made their ouerthrow more miserable, then their ioy and good happe was great at the beginning. For the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, (who as we have faid before kept the battell) not being able any longer to withstand the force of the Romaine s, they retired towards the Afrigeme of Hã CANS in the wings. The ROMAINES perceiving that, ranne vpon the enemies with all the furie * Tlutarch they could, and had them in chase and fought with them, till they were gotten in the middest of in the life them. Then the CARTHAGINIANS that were in both wings, came and compassed them in beof Fati. us faith, forethey were aware. Moreouer, there were fine hundred of the NVMIDIAN horsemen, that colourably fled vnto the Consuls, who received them very courteously, & placed them in the rerewere fifty 1 houf and ward of the army. They feeing their time, shewed behind the enemies, and did sodainely give (Laine and them charge. Then the armie of the Romaines was veterly ouerthrown, and Hannibal Obtained fourtzene victory. Linie writeth, that there were flain in this battel*forty thousand footmen, & aboue two thou fand taken prithousand seuen hundred horsemen. Polybins saith, that there were many more slaine. Well, letting this matter passe, it is certaine that the Romains had neuer greater losse, neither in the first Paulus Aewar with Africk E, nor in the fecond by the Carthaginians, as this ouerthrow that was malius Con full, flaine giuen at CANNES. For there was flaine the Conful Paulus Æmylius himselfe, a man vndoubtedly deseruing great praise, and that serued his countrey and common wealth euen to the howre tell of Can-

of death: Cn. Servillus (Confull the yeare before) was also flaine there, and many other that had bene Confuls, Prætors, and others of fuch like dignity, Captaines, Chieftaines, and many other flagsbier de flagsbier de flagsbier de Senators and honest citizens, and that such a number of them, that the very crucky it selfe of the she bases enemy was fatisfied. The Conful Terentim Varre, who was the onely author of all this war and flaughter, feeing the enemy victor enery way, he faued himselfe by flying. And Tutidanus a Chieftaine of a band, comming through his enemies with a good company of his men, he came vnto Canvs Iv M. Thither came also about ten thousand me, that had escaped fro their enemies. as out of a dangerous storme: by whose consent, the charge of the whole army was given ynto Appius Pulcher, and also vnto Cornelius Scipio, who afterwards did end this war. Thus was the end of the battell fought by CANNES. Newes flew straight to ROME of this ouerthrow, the which though they justly filled all the city with forrow & calamity, yet the Senate & people of Rom B keptalwaies their countenance and greatnesse, euen in this extreame misery. Insomuch they had inconnot onely good hope to keepe their city fafe, but furthermore they leavied a new army, and the Romains made yong mento beare armor, and yet left not Sicilb and Spain Evnprouided in the meane time; fo that they made the world to wonder at them, to confider these things, how they could info great calamity and trouble have fo noble hearts, and fuch wife counfell. But to let paffe the former overthrowes, and great loffes they fultained at TICINVM, at TREBIA, and at the lake of the Ro-THRACIMENE, what nation or people could have bornethis laft plague, whereby y whole force mainter loff and power of the Romains was in manner veterly destroyed and overthrowne? and yet the people of Rome fo held it out, and that with fo great wifedome and counfell, that they neither Hamibal lacked manhood nor magnanimity. Besides, to helpe them the more, Hannibal being conqueror, Trebia and trifling time in taking his leifure, & refreshing his army he gaue the Romaine s leifure that were Trifling his army he gaue the Romaine s ouercome to take breath again, and to restore themselves. For doubtlesse, if Hannibal being conqueror, had immediatly after the victory obtained, brought his army directly to Rome, furely $ ROMAINES had bene vitterly vindone, or arthe leaft had bin copelled to have put al in venture. Soit is reported, that Hannibal oftentimes afterwards repented him felfe he followed not his victory, complaining openly, that he rather followed their counfell which wished him to let his fouldiers reft, then Maharbals aduice, generall of his horfemen, who would have had him gone Maharbal; straight to Rome, and so have ended all this war. But he seeing Hannibals delay, told him (as it General of is reported) this that is now commo in every mans mouth: Hamibal, thou knowest how to overcome, but thou knowest not how to vie victory. But what all things are not (as Ne flor saith in Ho. mer)giue to me altogether. For some had no skill to ouercome, others knew not how to follow familial their victory, and some also could not keepe that they had won. Pyrrbus king of the Epiror Es that made war with the ROMAINES, was one of the famousest captains that euer was yet as men erula not write of him, though he was maruellous fortunate to conquer realmes, he wold neuer keep the. Euen fo in like maner, some captaines have bin endued with excellent vertues, and yet not with. standing have bene insufficient in marrial affaires deserving praise in a captaine, as we may reade in divers histories. Now after this battel fought by CANNES, the ATTELLANIANS, the CALA-TINIANS, the SAMNITES, after them also the BRYTIANS, LVC ANIANS, & divers other nations and people of ITALY, caried away with the fame of this great victory: they all came and yeelded to Hannibal. And the city of CAPVA also (which Hannibal was desirous to have won long before) for laking their old friends and confederates, made new league and friendship with Hannibah the which wan him great estimation with other nations. For at that time the city of CAPVA was very Populous and of great power, and the chiefest city of estimation of all ITALY next to Rome. Now to tell you in few words what is reported of CAPVA, it is certaine that it was a Colony of the THYSCANS, which was first called VVLTVRNVM, & after that CAPVA, by iname of their gouernor called Capius; or otherwife (as it is most likely) because of the fields round about it: for the clip of on every fide of it, there are goodly pleasant fields, ful of alkinds of fruits growing on the earth, capua, how called in Greek, Kepi. Furthermore, all the country is confined round about with famous nati-Ons. Towards the feathere dwell the SVESANIANS, the CVMANIANS, & the NEAPOLITANS. On firme land also towards the north, are the CALENTINIANS and the CALENIANS. On the East & Southfide, the Dynians & the Nolians. Furthermore, y place is of a strong situation, and on the one fide is compaffed in with the fea, & on y other fide with great high mountaines. Nowthe CAMPANIAN'S florished maruellously atthattime: & therfore seeing the ROMAIN'S in maner viterly undon by the battel they had lost at CANNES, quickly took part with the stroger, as it commonly falleth out:and furthermore besides that they made league with Hannibal, they received him into their citie with great triumph, hoping that the warre being ended, they should be the chiefest and wealthiest of all ITALY. But marke how men are commonly deceived intheir expectation. Now when Hannibal came into the citie of CAPVA, there was a world of people that went to see him, for the great fame they heard of him. For there was no other talke, but of his happy victories he had won of the enemy. So being come into the citie, they brought him vnto Pacuuius house, his very familiar friend, who was a man of great wealth and authoritie, as any among all the Campanians. Then he made him a notable banket, to the which no citizens were bidden, fauing onely Inbellius Taurea a flout man, and the founc of Pacunius his host: who through his fathers meanes, with much ado, was reconciled to Hannibal, for that Hannibal hated himas he did, because he followed Decius Magius, who alwaies tooke the Romaines part. But now let vs confider a litle I pray you, how great men fometimes vnawares are subject to great dangers and misfortunes. For this yong man diffembling his reconciliation with Hannibal, watching time and occasion notwithstanding to do him some displeasure, in the time of this feast, while they were making merry, he tooke his father aside into a secret corner of the house, and prayed him together with him, by a great good turne, to redeeme the fauor and good will againe of the Romains, the which they had lost through their great wickednes. Then he told him how he was determined to kill Hannibal the enemy of his country, and all ITALY besides. His father that was a man of great countenance and authoritie, was maruellously amazed withall, to heare what his fonne faid: wherefore embracing him with the teares running downe his cheekes, he prayed him to leaue off his fword, and to let his guest be safe in his house. The which his sonne in the end yeelded with great ado. Thus Hannibal having before withftood all the force of his enemies, the ambushes of the Gavles, and having brought with him also a great army from the fea, & the farthest part of Spaine, through so many great and mightie nations: he scaped killing very narrowly by the hand of a yong man, whilest he was at the table making merry. The next morning Hanmbal had audience in open Senate, wherehe made great and large promifes, and told them many things, which the Campanians eafily beleeued; and therefore flattered themsclues, that they should be Lords of all ITALY: how beit they reckoned beside their host. And to conclude they did so cowardly submit themselves to Hannibal, that it seemed they had not only fuffred him to come into their city, but that they had also made him their absolute Lord, likemen that neither remembred nor regarded their libertie. And this appeareth plainly by one example I will shew you amongst many. Hannibal willed them to deliuer Decius Magius, the head of the country faction to him. Wherunto the Senate not only obeyed with all humilitie, but worst of all, suffered him to be brought bound into the market place, in the presence of all the people: who because he would not for sake the ancient league and friendship with the Romaines, had shewed himselse a more faithfull citizen to his countrey and commonwealth, then vnto the barbarous people. Now whilest these things passed thus in CAPVA, Mago (Hannibals brother) went to Carthage, to report the newes of his happy victory to his countrimen, which they had won of the enemies: and withall, before the Senate to declare the noble exploits of armes done by Hannibal. And to proue the words true he spake, he powred out at the coming in of the Senatehouse, the golden rings which had bin taken fro the Romaine knights: of the which there were (as some do report) aboue a bushell ful, and as other some do write, aboue three bushels full and a half. After that, he prayed a new supply for Hannibals army; which was granted them by the Senate with greater ioy then afterwards it was fent. For the CARTHAGINIANS, perswaded themsclues by the things present, that the war would fall out as fortunate, as the beginning was faire: they thereupon decreed to continue the warre, and to aid Hannibals attempts, by leuying of foldiers. Now no man withstood this new supply to be sent to Hannibal, but Hanno a perpetual enemie of the BARCINIAN faction. Howbeitthe CARTHAGINIANS weighed not his counsell and aduice then, though it rended to peace, and was good counsell for them, as oftentimes before he had vsed the like. So when Hannibal had made league with the CAMPANIANS, he led his camp before the citic of NoLA, hoping they would yeeld of themselues without copulsion. And certainly so it had come to passe, had not the sodaine coming thither of Marcellus the Prætor bene, who both kept the people in, pacified the fedition, and repulfed the enemy that was coming into the citie, by a fally he made vpon him at three feuerall gates, chafing and killing them euen to their campe with great losse. This is that noble Captaine and valiant fouldier Marcellus, who

with a noble courage made the world know, that Hamilton was no other way, but to let Nola alone til another time; he came to Acerres, and tooke and spoiled it without refistance. Then going on further with greater power unto Car esthetite SILINVM, a fit place to offend the CAPVANS, he went about to win the that lay there in garrifo: of Rola. but when he saw that neither his faire promises, nor otherwise his threats could prevaile, he left part of his army to beliege the citie, and beltowed the relidue in garrifons before the winter feafon. Howbeit he chose for his chiefest seate and strength the citie of CAPVA, which stood very pleasantly, and had plentic of all things. There it was that Hannibals souldiers being vsed to lichard, and eafily to away with cold, hunger and thirst, became then of valiant men, rank cowards, of strong men weaklings, and of serviceable and ready men, timorous and effeminate perfons, through the dayly pleasures they enjoyed at will. For sweete inticing pleasures do corrupt fouldiers the strength and courage of the mind, and mans disposition vnto vertue: moreover they spoile with east his wit, and take all good counsell from him, al which things are dangerous for men. And there at Capua. fore Plato rightly calleth pleasure, the baite of all euils. And doubtlesse in this case, the pleasures of CAMPANIA did hurt the CARTHAGINIANS, more then otherwise the highest Alpes, & all the the baite of armies of the Romaines did. For one onely winter passed ouer in such pleasure and wanton- all emis. neffe, was of fuch great force to extinguish the vehement courage in the foldiers, that when they were brought into the field at the beginning of the spring, sure you would rightly have said affinitier, that they had forgotten all martial discipline. Thus the winter being passed ouer, Hannibal returned againe to CASILINVM, hoping that the citizens within would willingly yeeld vnto him, after they had abidden fo long a fiege. Howbeit they were bent to abide all extremity, before they would yeeld to their fo cruell an enemy, although they lacked victuals. Wherfore liuing first by spealt, or beare barley, and afterwards with nuts which they had received of the Romaines by the river of VVLTVRNVS: they held it out fo long, that Hannibal in the end being angrie ans to line with the continuance of the fiege, he was content to take the citic vpon composition, the which he hadrefuled before. Now this warre, in the which the Carthaunians had alwayes had Hamibals great victories and good fortune, and received no losse worthy of memory, began at that time good forto decline, and to fall to great change and alteration. For the league that was made with Philip king of MACEDON, and the new aid and supply that was sent from CARTHAGE, and the taking of Petilia, Constantia, and of other cities of the countrey of the Brytians, kept the CARTHAGINIANS in good hope. On the other side, the great victories which the ROMAINES had wonne upon the enemies of Spaine and Sardinia, did greatly encourage them, and gaue them also good hope that their affaires would prosper better and better. They had also chosen three excellent Captaines, Fabius Maximus, Sempronius Gracchus, and Marcus Marcellus, a man Three famost worthy of praise for martiall discipline: who so wisely governed the affaires of the state, taines of that Hannibal found he should make warre with an enemy, no lesse politicke and wife, then hardieand valiant. For first of all, he was driven from the citie of CVMEs, with great slaughter of mains, his men, by Sempronius Gracchus, and forced to raise his siege: and shortly after he was our come Maximus.

by Marcellus, in a battell he fought at NoLA. For there were flaine about a thousand Romains and 6000 CARTHAGINIANS flaine and taken flying. Now it is eafily seene what great importance that battell was of because Hannibal immediatly vpon it, raised his siege from Nora, and went into Apvilla to winter his army there. By this meanes came the Romaines to recouer againe, as out of a great ficknesse, and sent a great power against the enemy: and were not conwith a noble courage made the world know, that Hannibal was not inuincible. Hannibal percei- Marcellus

For incontinently after the battell was fought at CANNES, they for fooke the Romaines, even in the life ther fide, the Campanians knowing they had made a fault, and being afraid of this new pre- fand car-Paration of the Romaines, they fent to Hannibal into Apvila, to pray him to come and ayd theginians their citie (being of the number of the confederates) in their greatest necessitie. Hannibal de-

For in Nola, the people & Senate were at variance the one against the other, as they were likewife in divers other cities of ITALY. The common people defirous of change; favored Hannibal and the noble men, and men of authority, tooke part with the people of Rome. So when Hannibalswent to take the city of Nola, Marcellus met him with his army in battel ray, as he had often done before, and failed not to fight with him, even at the first meeting. There y Romains overcame, and draue the enemy with such manhood and readinesse, that if the horsemen which had taken another way had come in intime, as Martellus commanded them; no question the CAR-THAGINIANS had bin vtterly ouerthrown. Hannibal after he had retired his army into his camp with great flaughter, he shortly after departed thence, and went into the country of the SALEN-

TINIANS. For certain yong TARENTINES that had bin taken prisoners in former battels, where the Romains had bin ouerthrowne, and that were afterwards deliuered free without ransome: they to shew themselves thankfull, had put Hannibal in hope to deliver him the city of TAREN-TVM, so he would bring his army before the city. Hannibal inticed by their promises, did what he could to obtaine it, because he might have some city vponthe sea in his power, the which he had defired of long time. And indeed, of all the cities vpon the fea coast, there was none so meete as

TARENTYM, to bring aid out of GRECE thither, and also to furnish the camp with many things that were to be occupied daily. So though this thing was drawn out in length, by the garrifon of the Romains that valiantly refifted:yet Hannibal neuer gaue ouer his enterprife, vntill that Nico and Philomenes, the authors of the treason, had deliuered him the citie into his hands. The Ro-MAINS kept only the castle, the which is in maner enuironed with the sea on three sides & on the Tarentum fourth fide, that lay vpon the firme land, it was very strong with rampiers & bulwarks. Hannibal perceiuing that he could do no good on that side, because of their great strength: he determined vnto Hannibal by to shut vp the mouth of the hauen of TARENTYM, hoping that was the only way to make the Rotreason.

MAINS yeeld, when their victuals should be cut from them. Yet the enterprise seemed very hard because the enemies had all the straights of the hauen in their power, & the ships also that should befiege the iffue of the hauen, were shut vp in a narrow litle place, and were to be drawne out of the hauen, at the foot of the castle, to bring them into the next sea. But when neuer a man of the TARENTINES could deuise how to bring this enterprise to passe: Hannibal himselfe perceived that these ships might be drawne out of the hauen with certaine engines, and then to cart them through the citie to the sea. So having his cunning workmen in hand with the matter, the ships within few daies after were taken out of the hauen, & caried into the fea, & then came & shewed before the bar of the hauen. Thus the city of TARENTVM being wonagain, after the Romains had kept it the space of a hundred years. Hannibal leaving the castle besieged both by sea & land, he returned into Samnivm. For the Confuls of the Romains had spoiled & stripped the Cam-PANIANS that went out to forrage, & having brought their army before CAPVA, they determine ned(if it might be)to win it by fiege. Wherfore Hanibal being very for the fiege of CAPVA, he came with all his army against the enemy: and seeing shortly after that the Romains did not refuse to fight, they both marched forward, & doubtleffe to fight, it wold have proued a bloudy battel, had not Sempronius army seucred them as he did, which came into CAMPANIA under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius, after they had lost Sempronius Gracchus in the countrey of LVKE. For they feeing this army far off, before they could know who they were, the Romaines & Car-THAGINIANS were both affraid, and so retired into their campe. Afterwards the Consuls went into seuerall countries, the one into LVKE, and the other towards CVMEs, to make Hannibal remoue from Capva: who went into Lycania, and found occasion to fight with M. Centenius, who very fondly and desperatly did hazard his army left him in charge, against a subtill & dangerous enemy. The battel being begun, M. Centenius was flaine valiantly fighting, and few other escaped. After this also there hapned another losse; for Hannibal returning shortly after into A-PVLIA, he met with another army of the ROMAINES, the which Fabias the Prætor led, who also entrapped that army by ambushes, and flue the most of them: so that of 20000 men, 2000 scant escaped the edge of the sword. In the meane time the Consuls perceiuing that Hannibal was gone, they came with all their army vnto CAPVA, and did befiege it round. This being come to Hannibals earc, he came with his army into CAMPANIA, in very good order and well appointed: and at his first coming he set vpon the campe of the Romaines, having first willed the Cam-

PANIANS at the selfe same instant to make a sallie out on them. The ROMAINE Consuls at the first tumult of their enemies, deuided the army betweene them, and went against them. The CAMPANIANS were eafily driven againe into the city:howbeit against Hannibal; the battell was very bloudy. For ifeuer he proued himselfe a valiant Captaine or noble souldier, that day he flewed it. He attempted also to surprise the Romains by some stratageme. For as his men were about to breake into the Romaines campe, he fent one thither that had the Latine tong excellently well, who cried out by the commandement of the Confuls, that the ROMAINS shold saue themselues in the next mountaines, considering they had almost lost all their campe & strength. This cry made on v sudden had easily moved the that heard it, if the Romain's being throughly acquainted with Hannibals fubrilties, had not found out his deceit. Wherfore one of them incouraging another, they made the enemy retire, and compelled him in despite of his beard to flie into the campe. When Hannibal had done what he could by all device and practife possible toraile the fiege from Carva, & perceiuing al would not serue, being sory for the danger of his confederates: he then determined to call a counsel, the which he had passed ouer a long time, hauing reserved it for the last refuge. For he trussed vp his cariage, and marched away with his army, and as quierly as he could, he passed ouer the river of Vulturnus, and coassing through the coutries of $ Sidicinians, Atifanians, & Cassinians, he came to Rome with enfignes displayed, hoping thereby he should make them raise their siege, being so earnestly bent to win CAPVA. This flying straight to Rom B by currers, they were so afraid there, as Rom E was neuer inlike feare it stood in then. For they faw their mortal enemy come to the with enfignes displaid whom they had fo often proued almost to the vtter destruction of their Empire; and now they faw him present, whom they could not resist being absent, threatning to bring the Senate & people of Rome into subjection. So all Rome being in feare & tumult, it was ordained that Fuluius Flaceus (one of the Consuls lying before CAPVA) should be sent for home. And that the new Confuls Sulpitius Galba, & Cornelius Centimalus, should lie in camp out of the city: & that C. Cal- Sulpinius parmius Prætor should put a strong garrison into the Capitoll, and also that the citizens that had Galba, corpurmus Prætor mound put a trrong garrion into the Capiton, and and that the citizens that had nelim Circumstany office or dignitie, should be appointed by their countenance and authority to pacifie simalus, the sudden tumults that might happen in the citie. So Hannibal marched forward without stay- Conful. ing, till he came to the river of Anienes, & there camped within 24. furlongs of Rome & thortly after that, he came with 2000 horse so neare vnto Roms, that riding fro the gate Collina, vnto Hercules temple, he had leifure to view at his pleasure, the situation and wals of so great a cities

Fuluius Flaccus feeing that, could not abide it, but straight sent out certaine men at armes of the ROMAINES against him: who coming with great fury to give charge vpon him as they were commanded, they easily sent him packing. The next morning Hannibal brought his army out of Hannibal commanded, they carry tent that packing. The first including the could allure the compe, and did fet them in battell ray, determining to fight presently, if he could allure the innuals enemy to battell. The Romain's onthe other side did the like. So, both armies marched one a- Rome. gainst the other with such life and courage, that to see them, they appeared men that seared no danger, fo they might obtaine the victorie that day. For on the one fide, the CARTHAGINTANS were to fight (in manner) for the Empire of the world: the which they thought depended vpon this battel, as being the laft they shold fight. The Romains in cotrary maner, they were to fight for their country liberty, & their goods, to fee whether they could keep them, or that they shold come into their enemies hands. How beit there fell out a thing worthy of memory. For as they were ready set inbattell ray, tarying but for the fignall of battell to give charge, there fell such a wonderfull great shower and storme vpon them, that both of them were driven in spite of their teethes, to bring backe their army into their forts again. The next day following in like maner, Vnto the which it seemed the battell had bene deferred, when they had againe both of them see their men in battell ray, there fell the like storme vpon them, which did as much hurt the Ro-MAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, as the first: so that it forced them onely to looke to sauethemselues, & not to thinke otherwise to fight. Hannibal perceiuing this, he turned to his friends and told the, that the first time he thought not to win to Rome, & that at the second time the occasio was taken from him. So there was a thing that greatly troubled Hannibal, and that was this. That though he came so neare to Rome, with an army of horsemen and sootmen: yet he heard that the ROMAINES had fent aid into SPAINE, and that he had redeemed the country where he had bene, at a farre greater price then reason required. Wherefore being in a rage withall, he caused all the goldsmiths and bankers shops of the ROMAINES citizens to be sold by the Cryer. But afterwards cafting with himselfe, what a hardenterprise it was to take the citie of Rome, or else being afraid to lacke victuals (for he had stored himselfe onely but for ten dayes,)

Salabiaa

he raifed his campe, and removing thence came vnto the holy wood of the goddeffe Feronia, and rifled the rich temple there, and afterwards went thence into the countrey of the BRYTIANS and LVCANIANS. The CAPVANS having intelligence thereof, being left out of all hope, they yeelded vp their city vnto the Romaines. The city of Capva being thus yeelded vp,& broughtagaine to the subjection of y Romaines, it was of great importance to all the people of ITALIE, and withall brought great defire of change. Hannibal himselfe also following cuill counsell, did spoile and destroy many cities he could not keepe: whereby he did stirre vp the hearts of diuerse nations against him. For where before when he was conquerour, he had often let prisoners go without ransome paying, through which liberality he had won the hearts of many meneuen fo at that present time, his barbarous cruelty made divers cities (misliking to be subject to the Car-THAGINIANS) to rebell against him, and to take part with the Romaines. Amongst them was SALAPIA, the which was yeelded vp vnto the Confull Marcellus, by Blacius meanes chiefe of all the Romaine faction and a band also of choise horsmen which was lest there in garison, were in maner flaine enery man of them. This is the city where Hannibal fell in fancy with a gentlewoman, &therefore they greatly reproue his immoderate lust & lasciniousnesse. Howbeitthere are others, that greatly commending the continency of this Captaine, say, that he did neuer cate lying, and neuer dranke aboue a pinte of wine, neither when he came to make war in ITALY, nor after that he returned into Africk E. Somethere be also that fay, Hannibal was cruell & vncon-Hant, & subject to diverse such other vices how beit they make no maner of mention of his chaftiry or incotinency. Butthey report that his wife was a Spaniard, borne in Castvio, agood towne: and that the CARTHAGINIAN'S granted her many things, and trusted her very much, because of the great faith and constancy of that nation. Now Hannibal after he had lost (as we have told you) the city of Salapia, he found the meanes to cry quittance, & to make the Romains Iose more then he had lost. For at the selfe same time Fuluius Vice consull lay besieging of Her-DONEA, hoping to win the citie without refistance. And because he stood in no feare of any encmie round about him (for Hannibal was gone into the countrey of the BRYTIANS) he kept no warch, and was altogether negligent in martial affaires, contrary to the nature of the ROMAINE captaines. Hannibal being aductifed thereof by spials, would not lose such a goodly oportunity: & therfore coming into Apvlia with his army ready, he came fo haftily vpo Her Donia, that he had almost stolne vpon Fulnius, vnprouided in his camp. Howbeit the Romains valiantly receiued the first charge with such courage, that they fought it out longer then it was looked for. Notwithstanding in the end, as the Romains two yeares before that had bin ouercome not far from thence, with their Conful Fuluius: euen so likewise vnder the conduct of this Fuluius Viceconful, the ROMAINE legions were vtterly ouerthrowne, & their Captaine flaine, with the most part of his army. The Confull Marcellus was at that time in the city of SAMNIVM, who being aduertised of this great ouerthrow, defired to be even with him: and though it seemed he came too Viceconful. latero helpe things past remedy, yet he brought his army into the countrey of the Lveanians, whither he vnderstood Hannibal was gone after his victory, and came and camped directly over against his enemy, & soone after came to battel. The which the CARTHAGINIANS refused not, but gaue such a sierce onset on either side, that they fought it out till Sunne set, and no man knew who had the better and so the night parted them. The next morning the ROMAINS shewing againe in field in battell ray, made it knowne that the enemies were afraid of them. For Hannibal kept his men within the campe, and the next night following stole away without any noise, and went into Apvlia. Marcellus also followed him foote by foote, and sought to put all to hazard by some notable battell: for he bare himselse thus in hand, that of all the Romaine Captaines there was none matchable with Hannibal but himfelfe, either in counfell, wit, or policy, or essentiall discipline, or warlike stratagemes. Howbeit the winter following kept him, that he could not fight any fet battell with the enemie: for after he had made a few light skirmishes, because he would not trouble his souldiers any more in vaine, he bestowed them in garrison for the winter time. At the beginning of the next spring, procured partly by Fabius letters (who was one of the new Consuls for that yeare) and partly also through his owne dispofition, he brought out his garrisons sooner then they were looked for, and came with his army against Hannibal, who lay at that time at CANVSIVM. Now it chanced, that through the nearnesse of both their camps, and the good desire they both had to fight, in few dayes they fought three seuerall times. The first battel, when they had fought it out till night, in maner like hope of both sides, and that it could not be judged which of them had the better they both of purpose retired into their campe againe. The second day Hannibal was conqueror, after he had slainealmost two thousand seuen hundred enemies, and put the residue of the army to slight. The third day, the Romaines to recourt the shame and dishonor they had lost the day before; they were the first that prayed they might fight, & so Marcellus led them out to battell. Hannibal wondring attheir valiantnesse, said vnto his people, that he dealt with an enemy that could neuer be quiet conqueror, nor conquered. So the battell was more bloudy and cruell then any that was before: because the Romaines did their best tobe reuenged of their losse, and the Carthagintans on the other fide were mad in their minds, to see that the vanquished durst prouoke the vanqui- Hamilbals shers vnto battell. In the end, the ROMAINE's being sharply reproued, and also perswaded by words of Marcellus to sticke to it valiantly like men, that the news of their victory might come to Rome, before the newes of their ouerthrow: they flew in among the preasse of their enemies, and neuer left fighting, till that after they had thrife broken their enemics, they made them all flie. At the selfe sametime Fabius Maximus tooke the citic of TAR BNTVM againe, almost after the selfe fame forthit was lost. This being reported vnto Hannibal, he faid: the Romaines have also their Hannibal. The next year efollowing, Marcellus & Crispinus were chosen Consuls, who preparing Marcellus to put themselves in readinesse for warre, they led both the armies against the enemy. Hannibal and crisps despairing that he was not able to resist the in battel, he sought all the wits he had to denise some nus confult. way to intrap the by subtilty, whom he could not ouercome by battel. So Hannibals head being occupied thus, there was offered him a better occasion to bring this enterprise to passe, then he looked for. Betweene both camps, there was a prety groue, in the which Hannibal laid certaine bands of the NVMIDIANS in ambush, to intrapthe enemies passing too & fro. On the other side, Hamibal the Confuls by confent of them all, thought it best to send to view this groue, and to keepe it if dieth amneed required: lest in leaning it behind them, the enemies should come, and so be vpontheir iackes afterwards. Now before they remoued their army, both the Confuls went out of their campe, with a small company of horsmen with them, to view the situation of this place; and so going on very vndiscreetly, and worse appointed then became men of their authority & place, they vnfortunately fell into Hannibals ambush. So, when they saw themselties in a moment compaffed about on every fide with enemies, that they could not go forward, and were also fought withallbehind: they defended themselves the best they could, rather by copulsion, then of any determination they had to fight. So, Marcellus was flaine fighting valiantly; and Crispinus the o. The death ther Consull also very fore hurt, who hardly scaped the enemies hads. Hamibal being aduertised of Marcelthat Marcellus was flaine, who was the chiefest man of althe Romains Captains, that had most hindered the happy successe of his victories, & had besides troubled him most: he present went and camped there where the battell was fought, & when he had found Marcellus body, he gaue ithonorable pompe and funerall. Hereby we may fee how magnanimitie, and excellent vertues, The power are efteemed of all men: confidering that the cruell and most mortall enemy gaue honorable buriallto so noble and excellent a Captaine. The Romains in the meane time seeing one of their Confuls dead, and the other Confull very fore hurr, they drew ftraight to the next mountaines, and camped in a strong place. Howbeit Crispinus had fent to the next townes of the mountaines, to aduertife them that Marcellus his companion was dead, and that the enemy had gotten the ring he sealed his letters withall, wherfore he wished them to beware of any letters written in Marcellus name. Crispinus messenger came but newly vnto Salapia, when letters were brought also from Hannibal in the behalfe of Marcellus, to tell them that he would be there the next night. The SALAPIANS knowing his craft, they fent his messenger away, and carefully looked for Hannibals coming. About the fourth watch of the night, Hannibal came to the city of SALAPIA, who of purpose had put all the Romaines that had fled, in the vaunt guard, because that they speaking the Latine tongue, might make them beleeue that Marcellus was there in person. So when the citizenes had suffered 600 of them to come in, they shut roo the gates, and with their shot and darts thrust out the rest of the army, and then put all them to the sword they had let into the city. Thus Hannibal being in a maruellous rage he had miffed of his purpole, he removed thence; & went into the country of the Brytians, to aid the Locaians that were befieged by the ROMAINES, both by fea and by land. After all these things, at the earnest him, & c. request of the Senate and people, two new Confuls were created, both famous captaines, & valiant fouldiers, Marcus Liuius, & Claudius Nero: who having devided y army betwixt them, went vnto their seueral charge and prouinces. Claudius Nero went into the country of the SALENTI-NIANS, & M. Liuius into GAVLE, against Hasdrubal BARCINIAN, who was come ouer the Alps, & made hast to ioyn with his brother Hannibal, bringing with him a great army both of footme and horsemen. Now it chanced at the same time, that Hannibal had received great losse by Claudins the Cosul. For first of al, he ouercame him in the country of the Lycanians, vsing the like policies & fetches that Hannibal did. Afterwards again, meeting with Hanibal in Apvita, by the city of VENVSIA, he fought such a lusty battell with him, that many of his enemies lay by it in the field. By reason of the great losses, Hannibal suddenly went to METAPONT, to renew his army again. So having remained there a few daies, he received the army from Hanno, the which he ioyned vnto his, & then returned vnto VENVSIA. C. Nero lay not far from VENVSIA with his campe: who having intercepted letters of his enemies, he vnderstood by them that Hasdrubal was at hand with his army. Therupon he bethought himself night & day, what policy he might vse to preuent the ioyning of two so great armies together as these. So, after he had taken aduice of himselfe, he followed in sight a dangerous determination, but peraduenture necessary, as the time required. For leaving the camp vnto the charge of his Lieutenant, he took part of the army with him, & making great iourneyes, came to PISENVM (being the marches of Angona) fo that on the fixt day he came to SENA. There both the Consuls io yned their forces together, & fetting vpon Hasarubal by the river of Metaurum, they had very good lucke at that battell. For, as it is reported, there were fix and fifty thousand of the enemies slaine on that day: so that they Sena a city almost had as great an ouerthrow, as the Romaines had received before at the battel of Can-Metaurum NES. Now Claudius Nero, after this famous victory, returning as speedily vnto Venvs 1A as he M. Linius, went thence, he fet vp Hasdrubals head, where the enemies kept the watch: and didlet certaine and CiNero prisoners go, to carie news to Hannibal of this great ouerthrow. For afterwards it was knowne, Confuls. a. that Hamibal knew nothing yet of Claudius secret enterprise, nor of the speedy executió & great slaughter he had made. Whereat sure I can but wonder, that so subtle a Captaine as Hannibal, could be deceived by Clodius, confidering both their campes lay so nearetogether: so that he first heard the newes of the ouerthrow of his brother, and of all his army, before he vnderstood any thing of the Confuls departure, or heard of his returne against to the campe. Now Hannibal hauing not only received a generall, but also a particular great losse by the death of his brother, he faid then, he plainly faw the change and alteration of the CARTHAGINIANS good fortunes and shortly after remoted his campe, and went thence into the countrey of the BRYTIANS. For he knew that this great ouerthrow given by the river of Metaurum, was a maruellous incouragement to the ROMAINES, and would also be a great log in his way, for the successe of this warre. tion of the This notwithstading, he gathered together al his power he had left in ITALY, after so many great Carthagibattels and conflicts, and so many cities taken; and maintained the warre with an inuincible counsans good rage. But the most strangest thing in Hannibal was this, that through his authoritie & wildome, he kept all his army in peace and amity together (being a medley of Spaniards, Africans, The praife GAVLES, and of diverse other nations) & never man heard that there was any brawle or tumult among them. Howbeit the ROMAINES themselves, after they had wonne Sicile, Sardinia, bals great wijdome in and Spaine againe, they could neuer viterly ouercome him nor drive him out of ITALY, bethe gowernforethey had fent P. Cornelius Scipio into Africke: who making warre with the Carthagiment of his NIAMS, he brought them to such great extremity, that they were driven to fend for Hannibal home out of ITALY. Hannibal at that time (as we have faid before) was in the countrey of the ERVTIANS, making war by inrodes and sudden inuasions, rather then by any fought battell: sauing that once there was a battell fought in hast betwixt him and the Consull Sempronius, and The last immediatly after he came & fet vpon the same Sempronius with all his army. At this battell Hanbattell Hane nibal had the victory: but at the second, Sempronius ouercame him. Since that time, I can find in in Italy was no Greeke nor Latine Author, that Hannibal did any famousact in ITALY worthie memorie. with Sem-For being fent for into Africk B by the Carthaginians, he left Italy fixteene yearesafter premis, 175 this Africk E war was begun, greatly complaining of the Senate of Carthage, & of himself the which also. Of the Senate, because that all the time he had bene in his enemies countrey so long, they had allowed him so litle money: and so scanted him besides with all other things necessary for wayes delaied time after the victory, and had given the enemy liberty to gather force againe. It is reported also, that before he imbarked and tooke sea, he set vp a criumphing arch or pillar, by after bebed the wars. And of himself, because that after he had so often ouercome the Romains, he had alward to metemple of Iuno Lacinia, in the which were briefly grauen his noble victories, both in the Pu- Hamilais icke and Greeke tongue. So when he was departed out of ITALY, the wind ferued him so well, that in few daies he arrived at Leptis, & lading all his army, he first came to Adre Mento M. Hannibal derwards vnto ZAMA. There receiving advertisement how the affaires of the CARTHAGINI-1835 prospered, he thought it best to deuise some way to end this war. For this cause he sent vnto sipio, to pray him to appoint him some convenient place where they might both meet, & talke ngether of matters of great importance. Now it is not certainely knowne, whether Hannibal adthis of his owne head, or by commandement of the Senate. Scipio refused not to come to parly. Wherefore at the day appointed, there met two famous Generals of mightie nations, in Hammibals agreat plaine together, either of them having his interpreter, to talke together of diverse matters and Scipios whing peace and warre. For Hannibal was altogether bent to peace, because he saw the affires of $ CARTHAGINIANS WAXE WORSE & worse every day that they had lost Sicile, Sar-DINIA, and SPAIN E: because the warre was brought out of ITALY into AFRICKE; because Sywax (a mighty king) was taken prisoner of the Romain estand also because that their last hope consisted in the army he had brought into Africk E, which was the only remaine and reliefe of blong a war as he had made in ITALY and also because that the CARTHAGINIANS had so smal apower left (both of strangers, and also of citizens) that there were scarce men inough to defind the city of CARTHAGE. So he did his best to perswade Scipio with a long Oration he made, mherto agreeto peace, then to refolue of warre. Howbeit scipio that liued in hope to bring this warreto a good end, would not seeme to give earc to any peace. Wherefore after they had long lebated the matter of either side, in the end they brake off, & made no agreemet. Shortly after, was this famous battel striken by the city of Zama, in y which the Romains obtained victory. For first of all, they made the CARTHAGINIANS Elephants turne vpon their owne army, to carthagini. hat they did put all Hannibals horsemen out of order. And Lalius and Masinisa, who made both and at the the wings, increasing their feare, gaue the horsemen no leisure to gather themselves in order againe. Howbeit the footmen fought it out a long time, and with a maruellous great courage: inbmuch that the CARTHAGINIANS (trusting in their former victory) thought that all the fafety and preferuation of Africk 1, was all in their hands, and therefore they layed about them like men. The ROMAINES on the other fide had as great heartsas they, and be fides, they flood in the better hope. Howbeit one thing indeed did the ROMAINES great service to helpe them to the vittory: and that was, Lelius and Masinisaes returne from the chase of the horsemen, who ruled into the battell of the enemy with great furie, and did put them in a maruellous feare. For atheir coming, the CARTHAGINIANS hearts were done, and they faw no other remedy for them, but to hope to scape by flying. So it is reported, that there were slaine that day, aboue twenty thousand CARTHAGINIANS in the field, and as many more prisoners. Hannibal their Generall, after he had taried to fee the end of the battell, fled with a few of his men out of the The flying great flaughter. Afterwards when he was sent for to CARTHAGE, to help to saue his country, he of Hanniperswaded the Senate not to hope any more in wars, but did coused them, that setting all devices apart, they should send vnto Scipio the Romaine Captaine, to make peace with him vpon any condition. When the ten Ambaffadors had brought the capitulation and agreement vnto Car-THAGE of the articles of peace, it was reported that there was one Gifgo, who milliking to heare talke of peace, made an Oration, and perswaded all he could to renew warre against the Ro-MAINES. Wherefore Hannibal perceiuing that diverse men confirmed his opinion, and being Hannibal much offended to fee fuch beafts,& men of no vnderstanding, to dare to speake of fuch matters, could not in sodangerous arime: he cast him selse downe headlong, whilest he was yet in his Oration. So when he saw that the citizens and all the whole affembly thought this too presumptuous a part warre. of him, & vnmeet altogether for a free citie, he himself got vp into the pulpit for Orations, and aid: Let no man be offended, if a man that from his youth had bene alway out of CARTHAGE, and brought vp all his lifetime in wars, be ignorant of the lawes & ordinances of the city. After that, he spake so wisely of the articles of peace, that the CARTHAGINIANS being immediatly moued by the authority of fo great a person, they all agreed to accept the conditions which the Vanquisher, & the necessitie of time offered them. The articles out of doubt were very extreme, and luch as the vanquished are wont to receine with all extremity by the conquerours. But befides all other things, the CARTHAGINIANS were bound to pay the ROMAINES an anuall tribute, untill a certaine time were run out. So when the day came that the first pension was to be

Payed to the Romaines, and that every man grudged when the subsidie was spoken of: some Tay that Hannibal being offended with the vaine teares of the CARTHAGINIANS, he fell alaughing. And when Haldrubal Hadus reproued him because he laughed in such a common calamity of all the city, he answered, that it was no laughter nor reioycing from the heart, but a scor. ning of their fond teares, that wept when there was leffe cause (and onely because it touched euery private mans purse) then before, when the Romaine's took from the Carthaginians their ships, armor, and weapons, and their spoiles of the great victories which they had wonne before, and now gauclawes and ordinances vnto them that were vanquished. I know some Authors write, that Hannibal immediatly after he had lost the battel, fled into Asia, for that he was afraid they would deliver him into Scipioes hands, that perhaps might demand him of them. But whether that was done fuddenly, or some time after the battell was lost at ZAMA, it makes no great matter:confidering that all the world knoweth, that when he faw things brought to extremity, he presently fled into As IA vnto king Antiochus. So it is most true, that king Antiochus receined him with great courtefie, and vsed him very honorably: infomuch as he made him of councell with him all in all, both in private and publike causes. For the name of Hannibal caried great reputation with all men: besides that, he had a comon and mortal hate to the Romaines. which was a pricking spurre still to moue warre against them. And therefore it seemeth that he came in happy hourcinto that countrey, not onely to pricke forward the courage of the king against them, but also to set wars at liberty against the ROMAINES. So he told him, that the only way to make warre with the Romaines, was to go into Italy to leavy Italian fouldiers, by whom only that victorious countrey of all other nations might be subdued. He requested of the king a hundred ships, 16000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen onely. With this small army he promised to inuade ITALY, and that he would maruellously trouble the ITALIANS: whom he knew yet to stand in no small feare of him, for the very found of his name onely, because of the late warres he had made there, so fresh yet in memorie. Furthermore, he tooke heart againe vnto him to renew the warres of Africk e, if the king would licence him to fend men vnto Car-THAGE, to stirre vp the BARCINIAN faction, whom he knew hated the ROMAINES to death. When he had gotten the king to grant him his request, he called Ariston Tyrian vnto him, a fine subtle fellow, and meete for such a purpose: to whom he made large promises, and perfivaded him to go to CARTHAGE to his friends, and to carie them letters from him. Thus Hanmibal being a banished man, and fled out of his countrey, raised warre in all parts against the ROMAINES. And furely his counfell had taken good effect, had king Antiochus rather followed his advice, as he did at the first, then the vaine perswasions of his fine courtiers. But enuy, a common plague frequenting Princes courts, bread Hannibal great enemies. For they being afraid that by his counsels he should grow in great fauour with the king (for he was a wise and politicke Capraine) and that thereby he should beare great sway and authority: to preuentit, they lacked no device to bring him in differace with the king. And it fo chanced atthat time that P. Villius, who came Ambaffador vnto Ephesvs, had often conference with Hannibal. Hereupon his privite enemies tooke occasion to accuse him, and withall, the king himselfe became so iealous of it, that from thenceforth he neuer more called him to counfell. At the selfe same time also, as some do report, Publius Cornelius Scipio African (who was one of the Ambassadours sent vnto king Antiochus) talking familiarly with Hannibal, prayed him amongst other things to tell him truly, whom he thought the worthiest Captaine of all others. Hannibal answered him. First he thought Alexander, king of MACEDON the chiefest enext vnto him, Pyrrhus, king of the Epirotes: and thirdly, himselfe. Then Scipio African smiling, asked him: what wouldest thou say Hannibal, if thou hadst ouercome me? Truly said he, then I would be chicfest my selfe. This answer pleased Scipio maruellous wel, because he saw he was neither dispised, nor yet brought to be compared with the other, but left alone as peerelesse, by some secret stattery of Hannibal. After these things Hannibal found occasion to talke with king Antiochus, and began to lay open his life vnto him from his youth, & bewray the malice he had alwayes borne vnto the Romaines: whereby he fo fatisfied the king, that he was againe received into his grace and fauour, which he had almost vtterly lost. Thereupon the king was determined to have made him Admirall of his army by sea, the which he had put in readinesse for ITALY, and alfoto make proofe of his great courage and service, whom he knew to be a worthie man, and a mortall enemic to the Romaines. But one Thors, Prince of the ÆTOLIANS, thwarting this opinion, either for malice, or else for that his fancy was such the altered the kings mind, and cleane changed his purpose, the which was a matter of great importance for the war he preteded to make. For he gaue counsell vnto Antiochus, that he should go himselfe into GR ECE, & direct his own affaires: & that he should not suffer another to cary away the honor & glory of this war. Hamildal So king Antiochus shortly after went into GRECE, to make war with the ROMAINS. Within few daies after, when he cossulted whether he shold make league with the Thessalians, Hannibals of busto opinion was specially asked who spake so wisely touching the state of the THESSALIANS, & the make war chiefest matter of importance, that they all went with his opinion, & gaue their consents vnto it. Romainet. Now his opinion was, that they should not need much to care for § THESSALIANS, but rather to make all the means they could to get king Philip of MACEDON to take their part, or els to perswade him to be a Newter, and to take neither part. Furthermore, he gaue counsell to make war with the Romains in their own country, & offered himself to aid him the best he could. Euery man gaue good eare to his words, but his opinion was rather comended, then followed. Wherfore enery man maruelled, that fuch a Captaine as he, that had fo many yeares made warre with the Romains (who had in maner conquered all the world) should then be so light set by of the king, when it specially stood him vpon, to have such a mans help & counsell. For, what captaine liuing could a man haue foud more skilful or politike, or meeter to make war with the Romain's then him? Howbeitthe king made no reckoning of him at the first beginning of this warre, but fhortly after, difdaining all their counsell, he confessed that Hannibal onely saw what was to be King Anidonc. For after the Romains had obtained victory in the warre he made in Gree, Antiochus echai udge ment of fledout of Evrope into Ephesvs, where making merry, and following pleasure, he hoped Hamibal. toliue in peace, litlethinking the ROMAINES would come with an army into Asia. Now, these flattering courtiers fed still his humor:a perpetuall plague to kings & princes, that sufferthe selves to be flattered, & are cotented to be deceiued because they give good care to that that pleaseth them. But Hannibal, who knew the power & ambition of the Romaines, perswaded the king to hope for any thing rather then peace, & bad him trust to it, that the Romains would never stay, till they had proued whether they could enlarge the dominions of their Empire, into the third part of the world, as they had done in Africk, & Evrope. Antiochus perswaded by the authority of such a man, straight comanded Polyxenidas, a very seruiceable man, & skilful in sea seruice, that he should go meet with the army of the Romain es that was coming thither. Then he sent Hannibal into Syria, to leavy a great number of ships together, and afterwards made him and Hannibal mannibal into Syria, to leavy a great number of imps together, and after wards made that and made Generals (one of his fauoured courtiers) Generals of his army by sea: who notwithstanding made Generals of his army by sea: that Polyxenidas was put to the worst by the Romains, they went & set vponthe Rhodians, otherarmy that were confederates with them. Hannibal in this battel affailing Eudamus the Captaine of the by feat together RHODIANS, that led the left wing, he had already compassed in the Admiral galley, and doubtleffe had obtained the victory, but that y other wing came in to rescue, after they had followed Apollonius in chase, and tooke the victory from him, that was his owne. After this battell by sea, which had no great good fucces, we do not find that Hannibal did any thing worthy of memorie. For king Antiochus being ouercome, besides other conditions, the ROMAINES offered him, they defired that Hannibal (the mortall enemy of the countrey) should be deliuered vnto them. Hannibal foreseeing this long before, he suddenly stole from Antiochui, after this notable battell that was fought by Magnesia, where the kings power was ouerthrown. So, after Hannibal had wandred vp and downe a long time, he fled at length vnto Prusias king of BYTHINIA, for succor. Now he did not fo much trust to his friendship, but because he fought for the meetest place fied prohe could come by, as also for the safest, the which he most defired considering that the Ro-MAINE's had the most part of the sea and land in their subjection. Some say, that after king Antiochus was ouercome, Hannibal went into CRETA vnto the GORTYNIANS; and that the rumour ranimmediatly, he had brought a great masse of gold and silver with him. Wherefore being afraid lest the CRETANS should offer him some violence, he deuised this shift to scape the danger: he filled earthen pots with lead gilt, and sent them into the temple of Diana, faining that he was maruellous carefull for them, as though all his treasure had bene there. On the other side he had hid all his gold in images of braffe, the which he had left carelesly lying on the ground in the bouse. In the meanetime, whilest they warched the temple carefully, that these earthen pots should not be caried away without their privity, Hannibal hoised faile, and sed into BITHYNIA. which by fome mens faying, there ranne an old Oracle and Prophecy in this fort: The land of Liby (la shall couer under mold

There Hannibal lay, not spending his time idly, but passing it away in exercising of the marriners riding of horses, and training of his souldiers. Some Authors also do write, that at that time Pru-The made war with Eumenes, king of PERGAMVS, who was a confederate and friend of the Ro-NAINS: and that he made Hannibal his Lieutenant generall of his army by fea: who affailing Enmenes with a new found and vnknowne deuice, wan the victory of the battell by fea, For before they began to fight, it is reported that Hannibal had gotten an infinite number of snakes into earthen pots, and when the battell was begun, & they bufily tending their fight; hethrew those menes.king pots with fnakes into the enemies ships, and that by this fearefull and strange deuice he made them flie. Now whether this wastrue, or not, the old Chronicles do make no maner of mention, but only Amylius and Trogus: and therefore I report me to the Authors. So, the newes of the diffention betwixt these two kings, Prusias and Eumenes being brought to Rome, the Senate fent T. Q. Flaminius Ambassador into As 1A, whose name was famous for the noble victories he had obtained in GRECE to the end (as I coniecture) to make peace betwixt these two kings. Flaminius being come ynto king Prusias, he was maruellously offended, and fory in his mindto see Hannibal yet aliue (that was the mortallest enemy of the Romaines) after the conquest of so many nations, and the facking of fo many people: therefore he was very earnestly in hand with king Prustas, to deliver him Hannibal. Hannibal from the first beginning mistrusted king Prustas inconstancy very much, & therefore had digged diverse vaults in his house, & made seven severall vents to flie out at, if he were fuddenly taken. The report of Flaminius coming did increase his suspition the more, for that he thought him the greatest enemy he had in Rom E:both generally for the hate he bare vnto all y Romains, as also particularly for the remébrance of his father Flaminius, that was flaine in the battel fought by the lake of Thrasymene. So Hannibal being ful of care & griefe (as it is reported) he found denices to escape, the which stood him to no purpose against such a great power. For when the kings guard which were sent to take him, had copassed his house about, Hannibal thought to flie at their first coming, & to saue himselfe by the secretest vaulthe had. But when he found that the place was kept by the guard, then he determined to rid himself out of the Romains hand, by destroying himself. So some do report, that he was strangled by one of his men, whom he had comanded to helpe to dispatch him. Others write againe, that he had drunke buls bloud, & when he had drunke it, died, as Clitarchus, & Stratocles do falfly report of Themistocles. Howbeit Titus Livius, that famous Historiographer writeth, that Hannibal called for the poy fon he had ready for such a mischiefe, & that holding this deadly drinke in his hand, before he dranke, he faid: Come on, let vs rid the Romains of this paine & care, fith their spite & malice is so great, to haste y death of a poore old man, that is halfe dead already. The ancient Romains aduertised Pyrrbus king of the Epirotes, who came with ensignes displaied to the very wals of the city of Rome, that he should looke to himself, & beware of poyloning and these Romains now do make a friend forgetting his kingly state & faithfull promise, vilely to betray his poore guest. After he had said, bitterly cursing king Prusius, he poysoned himself, being 70 yeares old, as some writers do testific. His body was buried in a tombe of stone by LIBYSSA, on the which was engrauen no more but this: Here lieth Hannibal. The Romains being aduertised of his death, every man said his opinion, as his fancy served him. Some greatly blamed T. Q. Flaminius cruelty, who to make himselfe famous by some notable act (as he thought) made a poore old man put himselfe to death, that was in maner halfe dead by age, and besides, was past doing the state of Rome any more hurt, they being conquerors in maner, of all the world. But some again on the other side, commended Flaminius for it, & said, it was a good deed of him, to rid the ROMAINE's of their mortall enemy: who though he had a weake body, yet he lacked no wit, wife counsell, & great experience in wars, to intice king Prusias to make war, & to molest all Asia befides, with new wars. For at that time, the power of y king of BITHYNIA was fo great, that it was not to be lightly regarded. For after that, Mithridates king of the same BITHINIA, did maruellously molest the Romains both by sea & by land, & moreover sought battels with L. Lucullus, and Cn. Pompey, famous Captaines of the Romaines. And fo the Romaines might also be afraid of Prusias, and specially having Hannibal his Captaine. So some judge, that T.2. Flaminius was specially sent Ambassador vnto king Prusias, secretly to practise Hannibals death.

Howbeit it is to be supposed, that Q. Flaminius was not so desirous to have Hannibal so suddenly butto death, as he would have bin glad otherwise to have brought him again to Rome, that had done such mischiefe to his country: and this had benea great benefit for Rome, & much honor allo ynto himselfe. Such was the death of Hannibal the CARTHAGINIAN, a famous man doubtleffe, and highly to be commended for martial praise, setting his other vertues aside. So we may The praise of cassly judge, of what power and force his noble mind, his great wisdome and courage, and his Hannibal, perfit skill of martiall discipline was in all things. For in all the wars the CARTHAGINIAN'S had fovehemently, and with fuch great preparation enterprifed, they neuer thought themselues ouercome, till Hannibal was ouerthrowne at that great battell by ZAMA. So it appeareth that all their strength and skill of warres began, and also ended with Hannibal their Captaine.

Volius Scipio a PATRICIAN, of the family of the Cornely (who was the first Romaine Captaine against whom Hannibal fought in ITALIE) Theparens was the father of Cornelius Scipio afterwards furnamed African, the first: tage of fo called, because he had conquered that nation. The same Scipio, after he had obtained many great victories in Spaine, and done notable feates of armes, was in the end flaine with a wound he had in a battell against his enemies, as he was plying and encouraging of his men from placeto place, thronging in the greatest danger and fury of the battell. Shortly after did his brother Cn. Scipio also end his life, much after one felf maner, & was flaine valiantly fighting So thefetwo Captains, befides the fame they atchieuedby their noble deeds, left behind the great praise of their faithfulnesse, modesty, & courage the which made them not only wished for of their souldiers that were then living, but also of all the Spaniar Ds besides. Cn. Scipio had a son called P. Cornelius Nasica, one that had bin Consull, and had also triumphed: who being but a yong man, was thought the meetest man of all the city of Rome to receive Idea the mother of the gods. This Publius had two sonnes, the so famous Scipioes: of the which the one was called Afian, because he conquered Asia: and the other African, because he subdued Africk at that famous battel of Zama, where he ouerthrew Hannibal and the CARTHAGINIANS, as we faid before. Whose life we purpose now to write, not so much to make the glory of his name (so famous by all the Greeke and Latine Authors) the greater by Zzzz 3 confederates came thither, who being courteously received, returned to their lodgings with such answer as they liked. After this, Scipio being carefully bent to prosecute the warre he had taken army that lay in garrison for the winter time, euery man did certainly perswade themselues that the warre should prosper; and when they saw him, they remembred their old Captaines, insomuch that there was neuer a fouldier could have his fill with looking vpon this young man.

Howbeit, after he had commended the fouldiers for their noble courage, not despairing for the calamity of their country, he greatly honored Lucius Martins: to shew, that who so trusteeth in his owne vertues, need not enuy the glory of another man. So winter being past, he tooke the old and new bands out of the garrisons, and first of all determined to go & lay siegevnto new Car-THAGE. For of all the cities of Spaine it was the wealthiest, and none more meete to make war both by fea & land, then that, Moreouer, the Captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS had bestowed in this city all their munition, and greatest treasure: and left a strong garrison, both in the city, and castell. But the Captaines themselues were deuided in diverse countries, to the end that they

there might keepe the whole region fro spoile, least of all looking then, that CARTHAGE should it were fo couragious, that they did not only thinke themselues able to defend the city, but their hearts ferued them also to make fallies out vpon the enemy, and to skirmish with them, eucn to the very trenches of the Romaines campe. Howbeit it hapneth often, that what a man cannot obtaine by force, he may winne by industry. Now Scipio knew, that the lake or meare which is not farre from the wals of Carthage, did ebbeand flow with the tide, and that it was paffable by foord on that fide where they might eafiliest come to the wals: so, he thinking to im-brace this occasion, & that he could not possibly meete with a better device to take CARTHAGE: when he faw his time, he fet his men in battell ray, and having devided them into scucrall squadrons, gaue a more desperate assault vpon the city, then he had done before. In the meane time, he chose our a band of the valiantest men he had, and commanded them to wade ouer the lake, and to scale the wals on that side, where they within the towne made least account of it. So, these souldiers that were commanded to give this attempt, after they had passed over the lake without any let or trouble, they found that part of the wall without any watch or guard, because the greatest fury of the fight, was on the other side of the citic. Therefore they easily getting vp on the wall, came and affailed the enemies behind them. The citizens, and those of sookethe wals, and seeing themselues charged on euery side, betooke them to their legges, and got vp vpon the wals, there were two fouldiers at such variance for the matter, that all the army was in danger of diuision and mutiny vponthat occasion. Thereupon Scipio called his men together, and in open affembly told them, that he knew they both got vp on the wall together, and fo gaue them both a scaling crowne; and by this meanes their tumult was presently pacified.

Afterwards he sent vnto all the cities of Spaine, the hostages that were found in y city, which were a maruellous number: the which wanne him great fame for his courtefic and clemencie, whereby he allured many nations to yeeld themselves vnto the Romaines, and to forsake the

our history, as for that we would make all men know the order of his noble deeds, & morall vertues, to the end that all Princes and noble Captains in reading it, should be hold the lively image of perfit vertue, which many moue an earnest desire in the to follow the example of P.C. Scipioes life, who from his childhood gaue great hope and shew of a noble nature, and excellent vertue, after he followed the inftruction of martiall discipline, vnder the conduct of his father. He was caried into the field at the beginning of the second war with the CARTHAGINIANS, followed the campe being but 17 yeares old, and in a very short time grew so toward and sorward in all things, in riding, in watching, in taking all maner of paines like a fouldier, that he wangreat commendation of his own father, and befides, great estimation also of all the army. Furthermore, he shewed such tokens of a sharp wit and noble courage, that he made him beloued, and also feared of his enemies. For this Scipio was present at the battell of the horsemen, where P. Cornelius Scipio the Confull fought with Hannibal, by the river of Thefin: & fome writers do affirme, that Corne. lius the father being hurt, was almost taken by the enemy, had not his son Scipio saued him, who had then but a litle downe on his beard, he was so yong. After that also, at the battell that was fought by CANNES, to the great loffe, and in maner vtter destruction of the Empire of Rome, when the 10000 menthat fled to CANVSIVM, had all together with one consent referred the gouernment of the army vnto Appius Pulcher, that had bene Ædilis, & vnto Cornelius Scipio, that was yet but very yong: the same Scipio shewed then by his deeds, what noble mind and courage was in him. For when he saw certaine yong men consult together betweene themselues to forfake ITALY, he thrust in among them, and drawing out his fword, made them all sweare they would not for fake their country. These, and such like deeds done by him with a lively courage and noble mind, being then but a yong man, wan him fuch fauour with the Romaines, that not respecting his yong yeares, nor their ancient custome, they called him forward, & laid offices of great charge and gouernment vpon him. Infomuch that when he fued for the office of Ædilis before his due time, norwithstanding that the Tribunes of the people were against his suite, because he was so young a man: yet the people suffered him to be brought from tribe to tribe, and fo was presently chosen Ædilis with the most voyces. So after his father and vnkle (both famous and noble Captaines) had bene flaine one after the other in Spaine, and that the Romaines were in consultation to appoint some worthy Captaine in the roome: they could find no man that durst vindertake this so dangerous war, considering the losse of two so great Captaines before. Wherfore the whole affembly being called to chuse a Viceconsul, all the other Princes and Peeres of the Realme being filent at fo worthy a motion: Scipio only of all the rest, being but 24 yeares old, stood vp in the middest of them, and said, with a good hope and confidence he wold willingly take the charge vpon him. He had no fooner offered this promife, but he was prefently Scipio Fie- made Viceconfull of Spain E, with the wonderfull good wil and fauor of the people, who gaue him all their voices. Howbeit the Senators afterwards confidering better of the matter, against what Captains and nations he should make warre, they thought it vnpossible so yong a man could performe so weighty a charge. Wherfore mens minds were wonderfully changed againe on the sudden, as if the tribes of the people had repented them of their voices & election. Scipio perceiuing it, called an affembly presently, and made such an Oration of his age, and discipline of wars, that every man that heard him wondred at him, and the people began againeto renew the good hope they had of him for the warres. For he had not only a noble courage in him, being indued with fo many fingular vertues, but he was also a goodly gentleman, and very comly of person, and had besides a pleasant countenance: all which things together, are great meanes to win him the loue and good will of euery man. Moreouer, euen in his gesture and behauior, there was a certaine Princely grace. Now, the glory of martiall discipline being joy ned vnto those his rare gifts of mind and nature, it was to be doubted, whether civil vertues made him more acceptable vnto strangers, then wonderfull for his skill in warres. Furthermore, he had filled the common peoples hearts with a certaine superstitious feare, because he did daily (after he had taken the mans gowne) vse to go vp to the Capitoll, and so into the Church without any company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company in the company is the company in the company in the company in the company in the company is the company in the compa ny: infomuch that all men began to thinke that he learned some secret things in the temple, which others might not know, as they were perfwaded long before, that Numa Pompilius was taught by the Nymph Ageria. Furthermore, it seemeth that some had the like opinion of Scipio, as in old time they had of Alexander king of MACEDON, to wit, that oftentimes there was a fnake scene in his mothers chamber. But let these things go. Scipio departing out of ITALY with

For after both the Scipioss were flainc, and both Spaines almost lost, and the Romaine legions also overthrowne and put to flight, Lucius Martius a Romaine Knight, hauing gathered together the remnant of both armies, resisted (beyond all hope of man) the enemies pussed up with glorie of the victorie they

CARTHAGINIANS. But one thing aboue all the rest chiesly increased his praise, and wanne him great loue and goodwill, as a mirrour and example of all vertue. There was a yong Ladie taken prisoner, that in beautie excelled all the women in Carthage: whom he carefully caused to be kept and preserved from violence and dishonour. And afterwards when he knew that she was maried vnto Luceius Prince of the CELTIBERIANS, he sent for her husband, that was a very yong man, and deliuered her vnto him, vntouched or dishonoured. Luceius not forgetting his noble courtesse vnto her, did let all his subiects vnderstand the great bountie, modestie, and rare excellencie of all kind of vertues that were in this Romaine General, and fliortly after, he return ned again to the Romaine's camp with a great number of horsmen. The three Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS (Mago Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, and the other Hafdrubal, the sonne of Gilgo) knowing that the loffe of new CARTHAGE did them great hurt, as well in the impairing of their credit with other strange nations: as also by the coiecture divers made of the successe of this war: they first practised to dissemble the losse of it, and then in speech to make light of it, as much as they could. Scipio having joyned to him divers nations and Princes of Spaine, (among the Captaines of which were the two litle kings, Mandonius and Indibilis,) vnderstanding where Hasdrubal Bar-CINIAN lay, he marched towards him with his army to fight with him, before Mago and the other Hafdrubal came to ioyne with him. Hafdrubal Barcinian lay in campe by the river of Befula, & was very desirous to fight, trusting wholy to his strength and army: but when he heard that Scipio was athand, he left the valley, and got to a hill of prety strength. The ROMAINE legions followed him, and gaue him no respite, but pursued so neare, that he came and affaulted his campe at the first coming. So they fought it out vpon the trenches and rampires, as if they had bene at the affault of a citie. The CARTHAGINIAN's trufting to the strength of the place, and driuen vnto it of necessitie (which maketh cowards most desperate,) they valiantly resisted their enemies the best they could. The ROMAINS in contrary maner, being valiant, and full of good hope, fought it out lustily like men, and the fight was fo much more cruell, for that it was in the fight of their Generall scipio, & of all the army besides: infomuch that their valiant service there could not be hidden. Therfore they neuer gaue ouer the affault, vntill that having done their vttermost indeuour, they got vp vpon the rampiers, and entred in divers places into the enemies campe, and made them flie. Haldrubal Captaine of the CARTHAGINIANS, faued himselfe by flying, with a few with him, before the ROMAINES entred into their fort. After this battel, Scipio according to his maner, caused all the Spanish prisoners to be brought before him, and then gaue them libertie to depart without paying of ransome. Among the prisoners, there was a yong Gentleman of the kings bloud, & nephew vnto Masinista, who when he had vsed very honourably, he fent vnto Masinissa, with great and rich gifts: to shew therby, that a Generall of an armie, should be as bountifull and full of civill vertues, as otherwise skilfull and expert in martial discipline. For the end of war is victorie; the benefite whereof confisteth in bounty and elemencie. From thence cometh the glorie and all other praises due to Captaines: as it happened in those things whereof we now treate. For a great number of Spanian Ds being prefent, wondering at the great elemencie of the General of the Romains, they could do no leffe but call him king, to honor and recompence his vertue. But Scipio strake that word dead straight, the which was no comon found to the Romaines eares, & therfore he would by no means allow that title, which he knew to be hateful to the Noble men of his courry, & also vnmeet for the liberty of the Ro-MAINES. He only prayed the Spaniards, that if they had any mind & defire not to shew themfelues vnthankfull to him, that then they would be faithfull and louing to the people of Rome. So whilest these things were done by Scipio, the other two Captains of the CARTHAGINIANS, (Mago, and Hasdrubal the sonne of Gisgo) after they vnderstood of the overthrow of their men by the river of Befula, made all the speede they could to ioyne together: and shortly after came and met with Hafdrubal BARCINIAN, to confult together, and to take order for the warre. So after they had layed their heades together, and confidered all things, they concluded thus: that Hafdrubal BARCINIAN should go into ITALIE to his brother Hannibal, where thewarre was greatest and that Mago, and the other Hasdrubal should remaine in Spaine, should send for aide from CARTHAGE, & should not fight with the Romains vntil all their forces looked for, were affembled, and so might make a great and puissant army. When Hasdrubal was gone into ITALY, Hanno was sent from CARTHAGE in his place. But practifing in his journey to make the CARTHAGINIANS to rebell, M. Syllanus came and set vpon him by Scipioes commandement, and was so fortunate, that he ouercame him in battell, and tooke him prisoner. Now there was a Hanno the city which the country men called ORINGE, the which was very wealthy, & meete to renew y chiefe of the war Lucius Scipio was fent thither with part of the army to befiege it but finding it a very frong thin water situation, and too well manned to take it at the first assault, he environed the towne, and within Hasarubal few daies took & facked it. Winter came on apace, & the time of the yeare made the both to retire into their garrisons, for the winter. So Scipio having had so good fortune in this war, he went barrel, and ynto TARRACON: Mago, and the other Haldrubal, the fonne of Gifeo, went to the fea fide. The taken prinext fommer, wars growing more bloudy & cruell then before in the lower Spaine, the Ro-MAINES & CARTHAGINIANS met, and ioyned battell by the river of Besula, & fought set battels. After they had fought a long time together, Scipio at length got the victory, and made the enemies flie (of the which there were flaine a great number in the field) and giving them no leifure to gather together againe, and to make head against him, he fought with them, & followed the chaie fo hotly, that Hasaribal and Mago were driven to leave the maine land, & to sie to Ga-DES, after they had lost all their army. In the army of the CARTHAGINIANS, there was a yong man of a noble courage, and very wife, called Masinista, who finding meanes to have secret conference with Syllanus, he was the first manthat offered him friendship, either being brought to offereit big ithrough Scipioes liberality, or else because he thought the time was come, that it was the furest friendspip way to take part with the Romains, which were the conquerors. It is that Mafinifa that afterwards (through the goodnesse of the Romaines) became the great and mighty king of Nv-MIDIA, and indeed he was diverse waies a profitable friend unto the Romaines. Furthermore, the selfe same yeare (which was the fourteenth of the second war with the Africans) Spaine was the first nation and people of the vplandmen dwelling in the heart of the Realme, that was conquered vnder the happy conduct of the Viceconfull Scipio: howbeit it was the last Realme that was made a province long timeaster, by Augustus Cafar. Now Scipio not cotenting himselfe with the great victories he had obtained, in very Thort time in Spaine (for he had an imaginatio and good hope also to conquer Africk) he thought it his best way, to make all the meanes he could possible to get Syphax king of the Mas #sylians, a fried to the Romains. Wherfore af- symus ter he had felt the kings mind, perceiuing that he was well inclined to make league with the Ro- king of the MAINES, he presently set all his other affaires aside, & failed into Africk with two galleys only, at fine oares to a banke. At the felfe same time also came Hafdrubal, the son of Gifgo thither, from GADEs: so that both these valiant and lusty Captaines came of purpose to the king, enuyingone the other, to craue the kings goodwill, vnto their countrey and commonwealth. Syphax welcomed them both into his court, and did vie them very honourably and court coufly, and appointed that they should both eate at one table, and lie in one selfe chamber, because the one should not thinke his entertainment better then the other. It is reported that Hasdrubal wondering at the magnanimity & great wisdome of Scipio that was present, he considered with himself the great danger the city of CARTHAGE and all AFRICKE besides was in, through that mans meanes: for he saw him yet a yong man, quicke, and excellent in all manner of great vertues, Hastenbals and that had continually obtained such victories: and therefore considering the lusty youth indeenens of this gentleman, he imagined that it was impossible to perswade him to embrace peace, rather then warre. Besides, he was afraid also that Syphax, moued by the personage and authoritie of himthat was present, would take part with the ROMAINES: and indeed his mind gaue him rightly, for so it happened. Forthough Syphax at the first shewed himselfe indifferent to them both, & had moved talke to end the war betwirt the Romains and the Carthaginians: yet afterwards when scipio told him he could conclude no peace without confent of the Senate of Rome, he rejected Hafdrubal, and inclining to Scipioes request, he made league with the people of systam Rome. So Scipio being returned againe into Spaine, himselfe partly by force, and partly also king of the by L. Martine meaner conquered In the Carry of and correspondence that the by L. Martius meanes, conquered ILITURGIVM, CASTVLO, and certaine other places that refuled to yeeld themselves vnto the Romaines. And to the end nothing should be lacking for league with all kind of sports and pleasures, after he had so fortunately obtained so many famous victories: when he was come to new Carthage, he caused the fencers to prepare the selues to fight with great pompe, where there were many great estates, not onely to fee that pastime, but also they The unforthemselues to handle the weapons in person. But amongst other Spaniards of noble tunate fight houses, there were two called, Corbis and Orsus, which were at strife together for the kingdome: of two conbut that day they ended their quarrell, the one being flaine by the others hand. The fight was maines.

SCIPIO AFRICAN. very lamentable and grieuous to the beholders: but the death of him that was flaine, troubled them much more, for they were both coufin-germains. After all this, scipio having his mind fill occupied in matters of greater weight & importance, then those which he had already brought to passe, he sell sicke. His sicknesse being carried through all Spaine, and as it happeneth often, his disease being reported to be much greater and dangerous then it was indeed thereupon, not onely the nations of SPAINE began to rife in hope of change, but the army it self also of the Ro-MAINES, the which he had left at Svero. First of all, martiall discipline was corrupted through the absence of the Generall. Afterwards also, the report of his sicknesse, and danger of his life being spred abroad in the armie, raised such a rebellion among them, that some of them little regarding the authoritie and commandement of the head Captaines of the bandes, they draue them away, and chose two meane souldiers for their Captaines; who presumptuously tooke vppon them the name giuen vnto them by men of no authoritie, and yet with more arrogancie, made the bundles of roddes and axesto be caried before them. Such folly doth furie and vaine ambition oftentimes worke in mens minds. On the other fide, the Spaniar Ds flept not, & specially Mandonius and Indibilis: who aspiring to the kingdome of Synine, came to Scipio when he was conquerour, after he had taken new Carthage. But afterwards, being offended to fee the power of the Romaines increase daily, they sought occasion to made some alteration. So after they had heard, not onely of Scipioes ficknesse, but also how he was at deaths doore, and did beleeue it: they presently leavied an army, and went and made warre with the Swessitans which were confederates of the Romains. But Scipio being recourred again of his ficknes, like as vpon the false rumour of his death euery man beganto rise: euen soafter the truth was known indeed of his recouery, they were all put downe againe, and not a man of them durst proceed any further in their rebellion. Scipio being more skilfull in martial discipline, then acquainted with fedition and rebellion, although he was maruelloufly offended with the fouldiers that had committed this folly; yet in the end, left following his anger, men should have thought him to have exceeded all bounds of reason in punishing of them, he referred all vnto the Consull. The most part of them gaue aduice, that the authours of the rebellion should be punished, and all the rest pardoned: for by this meanes, faid they, the punishment shall light vpon a few that have deserved it, and all the rest shall take example by them. Scipio followed that aduice, and presently sent for all the seditious bands, to come to new CARTHAGE to receive their pay. The souldiers obeyed demein po- his commandement, some of them making their fault reflethen it was, as men do often flatter themselues: others also trusting to the Capraines clemencie, as knowing him not to be extreme in punishment. For Scipio was wont to fay, that he had rather faue the life of one Romaine Citizen, then to kill a thousand enemies. This rumour can also, that Scipso had another army readie, the which he looked for to joyne with them, and then to fet vpon the kings (Mandonius and Indibilis) who made warre with the Swessitans. These fouldiers departing from Svero, with good hope to obtaine pardon, came vnto Carthage. How beit the next day after they were come into the towne, they were brought into the market place: where their armor and weapons being taken from them, they were enuironed with all the legions armie. Then the Romaine Generall sitting in place of judgement, shewed himself beforeall the company in as good health and good disposition of body, as euer he was in all his youth. Then he made a sharpe and bitter oration, full of grieuous complaints: infomuch as there was not one of all the fouldiers that were vnarmed, that durst cast vp their eyes, or looke their Generall in the face, they were so ashamed. For their consciences did accuse them for the fault they had committed, and the seare of death did take their wits and sences from them, & the presence of their gracious Captaine, made them blush as well that were innocent, as the parties that were offenders. Wherfore there was a generall and forowfull filence of all men. So after he had ended his oration, he caused the chiefe authors of this rebellion to be brought forth before the wholeassembly: who after they had bene whipped according to the maner, were presently beheaded, the which was a feareful and lamentable light to the beholders. These matters thus pacified, Scipio made all the other soldiers to be fworne again, and then went and proclaimed war against Mandonius and Indibilis. For they confidering with themselues, how the Romains fouldiers that had rebelled in the camp, were put to death, they were out of hope to obtaine any pardon. Therefore they had leauied an armie of twenty thousand footmen and two thousand horsemen, and came downe with them against the ROMAINS. Scipto having intelligence thereof, before that the kings could increase their army, & that other nations could rebell the departed from CARTHAGE, & went with as great speed as he could, to meet with y enemy. The kings were camped in a very firog place, & trusted fo to their army, that they were not determined to prouoke the enemy, nor also to refuse y battel if it were offered them. Howbeit it chanced by the neareneffe of both campes, that within few daies, they being prouoked by the Romains, came downe and fet their men in battell ray, & ioyned battel with Scipio: fo that a good while together, the fight was very bloudy & cruell. But at length the SPANIAR DS seeing themselves compassed in behind, & being driven to fight in a ring to defend the enemy on every fide, they were overcome; so that the third part of them scarcely saved theselucs by flying. Mandonius and Indibilis seeing themselucs vtterly vndone, and that there was no hope nor remedy left, they fent Ambassadors vnto Scipio; humbly to pray him to receive them to mercy, and to pardon them. But Scipio knowing right well how greatly they had offended him, and the Romains; yet thinking it more honorable to ouercome the enemy by curtefie and elemency, then by force: he did pardon them, & only commanded them to give him mony to pay thing toohis fouldiers. In the meane time Masinissa came from GADES, & landed: because he would himselfe in person confirme the friendship he had offered Scipio in his absence, by the meanes of M. Syllanus, & also speake with him face to face, who he judged to be a worthy man, for the famous Majiriffa victories he had obtained. And in truth Masinissa was not deceived in the opinion he had of the valiantnes & vertues of scipio, but found him the selfe same man whom he before had imagined him to be in hismind: the which but seldome happeneth so notwith standing. For besides the great rare gifts of nature that Scipto had aboue all others, there was in himalfo a certain princely Aprincely great rate gitts of nature that scipio had about an others, there was in initiation certain principle grace and maiefly. Furthermore, he was maruellous gentle & courteous vnto them that came to Scipios him, and had an eloquent tongue, and a passing gift to win euery man. He was very graue in his fersonage. gesture & behauior, and euer ware long haire. Masinissa being come to salute him, when he saw him, he had him in fuch admiration, as it is reported, that he could not cast his eyes off him, nor haue his fill of looking on him. So he thanked him maruelloufly for fending his nephew vnto him, & promised him that his deeds should confirme & witnesse the friendship agreed vpon betweene them: the which he ener after inuiolably kept vnto the Romaines, even to the houre of his death. So all the nations of Spaine became subject to the Empire of Rome, or at the least their cofederates: wherupon those of GADEs also following y example of others, came & yeelded themselucs vnto the Romains. This is a very ancient nation, & if we may credit the report The Anis. of it, as Carthage was in Africk, & Thebes in Boeotia; lowas Gades vpo ý lea, a Colony of the Tyrians. Scipio after he had coquered al Spaine, & driven out the Carthagini- Gades. ANS, confidering that there remained nothing more for him to do, he left the gouernment of the ble deedes. province vnto L. Lentulus, & to Manlius Acidinus, and returned to Rome. When he was arrived Scipioesre at Rome, the Senate gaue him audience out of the city, in the temple of Bellona. There, when he turne out of had particularly told them of the things he had valiantly and fortunately brought to end: and Spaine to further, that he had ouercome foure Captaines in diverse foughten fields, and also put to flight four earmies of the enemics, and driven the Carthaginians out of both Spaines, and that there was no nation left in all those parts, but was subdued to the Romaines: the Senate gaue udgemer, that althese things were worthy of a noble triuph. But because never man yet was suffered to enter into Rom E in triumph, for any victories he had obtained, whilest he was only but Viceconfull, and had not yet bene Confull: The Senators thought it not good, and Scipio himselse also made no great suite for it, because he would not be an occasion, to bring in any new custome, and to breake the old. So when he came into the city, he was afterwards declared Confull, with the great good will and confent of the whole affembly. It is reported that there never confull. came such a world of people to Rome, as were there at that time, not only for y assemblies sake, but more to fee Publius Cornelius Scipio. Wherefore not the Romaines onely, but all the strangers also that were there, all their eyes were vpon Scipio, and said both openly and prinately: that they should send him into Africke, to make warre with the CARTHAGINIANS, at home in their owne countrey. Scipio also being of the same opinion, said, that he would aske aduice of the people, if the Senate would be against such a worthy enterprise. For amongst the Peeres and Senators, there were fome that vehemently inueved against that opinion, and amongst the rest, Fabius Maximus specially, a man of great fame and authoritie. Scipio went forward with the matter, and thwarted him, and shewed many reasons that there was no way to ouercome the CARTHAGINIANS, and to drive Hannibal out of ITALY, but that only: and that all other counsels were in vaine, & vnprofitable. After this matter was long debated in councel, Sierle was appointed vnto Scipio: and the whole Senate gaue him commission to go with his army into AFRICKE, if he thought it meete and profitable for the commonwealth. The decree of the Senate being published, every mans mind ran of so great enterprises, that they perswaded themselues Africk & was already their owne, and had great hope to end this warre. Howbeit Scipio faw it a hard matter to make his preparation for this journey, because of the pouerty of the common treasure, and for lacke of yong men, the flower and choise of the which was vtterly gone, by the former great losses and ouerthrowes Hannibal had given them. How beit to fatisfie every mans expectation of him, he made all the possible speed he could, to prepare things necessary for the warres. So diverse people of THVSCAN, and of the VMBRIANS, offered to help him to their best powerssome of them gaue him timber to build his ships, others holpe him with armor, and others also furnished him with corne, and all other kind of victuals, and munition for his army. The ships being built, and all the army by sea put in a readinesse, in the space of fine and sortie dayes, athing incredible to many, Scipio departed out of ITALIE, and failed towards Sicile. But when he came to take muster of his army, he specially chose that had served long time in the warres, vnder the conduct of M. Marcellus, the which were all esteemed for very expert fouldiers. And for the Sicilians, he partly wanne them by courtefic, and partly by compulfion compelled them to give him aid for the war he tooke in hand, the which he meant to make in Africk E, when the time of the years should serue for it. Among other things, it is reported that Scipio chose out of diverse cities, three hundred young gentlemen of the noblest houses of all the faid prouince, and commanded them to meete at a certaine day appointed, enery man with horse and armour. They then coming at the day appointed, according to his commandement, the Confull bad them chuse whether they would follow him in the warres of A FRICK E, or els deliuer vp their armor and horse to as many other Romaines as they were in number. So when they all prayed they might be dismissed from the warre, Scipio appointed 300. other yong Romaines in their places, whom he had brought out of Italy with him vnarmed, because he would mount & arme them at the Sicilians cost, as indeed it chanced. Afterwards they did him great service in Africk, in many great battels. Now time was come on for Scipio to put his army in garrison for the winter time, when he came to Syracvsa, taking order not only for the preparation of war, but also for the affaires of Sicile. There when it was told him by complaint of divers, that there was a great company of ITALIAN fouldiers in that city, who wold not restore the spoiles which they had gotten in the wars, but kept the still in their hands, notwithstanding that the Senate had enjoyeed them by special comandement to make restitution to the Syracvsans: he straight compelled them by proclamation, to accomplish the Senates commandement. Whereby he wanne all the peoples hearts of Sicile, and was reported to be a just and vpright Confull. In the meanetime he was advertised by Caius Lelins, that returned out of Africk E with great spoile, how king Masinista was very desirous of his coming: thither, and that he inftantly prayed him he would come into Africk E, as foone as he could possible, so it were without the prejudice of the commonwealth. Moreover, that diversenations and people of Africke had the like defire: who hating the gouernment of the Carthagini-ANS, defired nothing more then fome good occasion to rebell. Now this iourney was not deferred through Scipioes fault or negligence, confidering that fuch a Captaine could hardly be found that was more careful & diligent in his charge then he. How beit the affaires of Sicilia, and the oportunity he had to recouer Lock Bs again, did hinder him that he could not bring his purpose to passe according to his mind. Furthermore, his Lieutenant Pleminius disorder grieued him much, because that having left him at Lock Es, he fell to all forts of insolencie, as to defloure women, and to spoile the poore citizens: insomuch that they being maruellously offended with these infinite troubles and villanies offered them, they determined rather to suffer all other things, then to be subject to the government of so vile and wicked a man. So the Ambassadors of Lockes being arrived at Rome, and exhibiting their complaints in open Senate, of the great wrongs and iniuries Pleminius did them: the noble men tooke the matter fo grienously, that they made bitter decrees, not only against the same Pleminius, but also against P.C. Scipio himselfe. Whereupon Scipioes enemies having gotten matter inough to accuse him, they were then so bold to affirme, that he was acquainted with the iniuries offered the Localans, with the licentiousnesse of Pleminius, and with the rebellions of his souldiers also: and that he had fuffered fuffered all these things more negligently, then became the office or duty of a Consul. They added thereto moreouer, that his army he had in Sicils was altogether varuly & vaferuiceable, and regarded not the ordinances of the camp and that the captaine himself was carelesse, and al- 2. Fabins logether giuen ouer to pleasure & idlenesse. But aboue al others Fabius Maximus was his heavy memic, and so vehement against him in his words, that he exceeded the bounds of all modestic andreason, and thought good to call him presently homeout of Sicile, and to dismisse him of his charge. This decree was thought of all men very straight, & extreme. Wherfore, following Quintus Metellus counfell, the Senators appointed ten Ambassadors to go into S1c11 E, to make diligent inquiry, whether the accusations objected against Scipio were true; and if they found him in fault, that then they should command him in the name of the Senate presently to returne into Iral y. And on the other fide, if they found that he was vniustly accused, and onely through the procurement of his malicious enemies & detracters: the that they should send him to his army, and encourage him valiantly to go forward with this war. So when the Ambassadors were arnued in Sicile, after they had made diligent inquiry according to the articles of their comission, they could not finde that Scipio was faulty in any thing, fauing that he had too lightly passed out the wrongs and iniuries Pleminius had done vnto the Lock IANS. For Scipio was very liberall in rewarding of his men, and exceeding curteous, & merciful also in punishing of them. But when they faw his army, his ships, and all his other furniture & munition for war: it is reported that they wondered so much to see the great abundance, and good order taken for al things, that when they returned to Rom s, they greatly commended Scipio, and reie all the acculations of his accusers, they did promise the Senat & people of Rom B affured hope of victory. So when althese home-troubles at Rome were take away, there chanced other outward troubles abroad that grieued him much. For y Ambassadors of king Syphax came and told him, that their master king si. had made new league with the CARTHAGINIANS, & was become friend vnto Hafdrubal, whose daughter he had maried; and therfore that he wished him if he meant to do his country good, to the Romake no attempt vpon Africk B, for he was determined to reckon the Carthaginians his maines. friends, & alfoto fet vpon them who the CARTHAGINIAN'S account their enemies. Scipio quickly returned the ambassadors againe vnto Syphax, because the effect of their comming should not be blown abroad in his camp; and gaue them letters, in which he praid king Syphax, that remembring his league & faithful promise, he shold beware he attempted nothing vnworthy the name ofaRomain, & faith of a king. Afterwards calling his mentogether, he told them that the Ambaffadors of king Syphax were come into Sicile, to coplain of his long tarying, as Masinissa had done before. Therfore he was to hasten his journy to go into A FRICK, and therupon commanded all his fouldiers to put themselues in readinesse, and to prouide all things necessary for their journy. The Confuls comandement being published through al Sicila, there repaired immediatly vnto LILYBEA a multitude of people, not only of those that were to faile into Africk, but of others also that came to see the fleete & army of the Romaines: because they neuer saw marmy better furnished, nor fet out with all things necessary for warre, nor better replenished with fouldiers, then that So Scipio, althings being ready imbarked at LILYBEA with fo earnest a desire to passe ouer the sea, that neither oares nor wind did cotent his mind. Yet he was brought infew daies failing, to the promontory or mountaine called Faire, & there he put all his men on land. The newes of his arrival flying straight to CARTHAGE, althocity was presently in such an vprore, that fodainly they founded the alarme, and guarded the gates & walles, as appeareth by testimony of some in writing. For from M. Regulus time vnto that present day, it was almost fifty yeers space since any ROMAIN captain ouer entred Africk with force of armes. And therfore it was no maruell though they were afraid, and grew to vprore. The name of Scipio did increase their feare the more, because the CARTHAGINIAN'S had no captaine matchable with him. Hasdrubal the sonne of Gifgo had the name at that time of a lusty Captaine, whom they knew had notwithstanding bene ouercome, and driven out of Spaine by Scipio. Howbeit putting all the hope and safety of their country in him, and in king Syphax that mighty king: they neuer left in-treating the one nor perswading the other, to come and help the affaires of AFRICK, with althe speed they could possible. So, whilest these two were preparing to joyne both their armies togenoble and wealthy a city, and being besides so commodious for the wars both by sea and land. At the selfesame time Masinissacame to the Romain's camp, and was inflamed with a vehement defire to make war against king Syphax, by whom he had before bin driven out of his kingdom & inheritance Scipio that had known him in Spaine, a yong Prince of an excellent wit, & quick & valiant of his hand, he fent him to discouer the army of the enemies, before the CARTHAGIA NIAN'S could gather any greater power, and willed him to vie all the deuice and meanes he could possible to intice Hanno to fight. Masinisas he was commanded, beganto prouoke the enemie. and drawing him out by litle & litle, he brought him where Stipio lay with al his legions armed. looking for a good houre to fight. The army of the enemies was now wearied, when the Ro-MAINES came to fet vpon them with their fresharmy. Hanno at the first onset was ouercome & flaine, with most of his men; and all the rest sted and dispersed themselves here and there, where they thought they might best scape. After this victory, scipio returning back againe to besiege the city of VTICA, the fodaine coming of Haldrubal and king Syphax, made him to leane off his enterprise, for that they brought with them a great army both of footmen and horsemen, and came and camped not far from the ROMAINES. Scipio perceining that, raised his siege immediatly, and came and fortified his camp vpon a hill, from whence he might go and fight with the enemy, and molest them of Vrica, and also keepe his ships fafe that rode at anker. Howbeitthe time of the yeare being come, that both armies were to dispose their me in garrisos for the winter season, he determined to send vnto king Syphax to feele his mind, and to make him leane the friendship of the CARTHAGINIAN's if it were possible. For he knew welit was his mariage with Sophoniba, which through her flattering perswasios had broght him to that fury, that he had not only for faken the friendship of the Romaines, but also meant to destroy them, contrary to his faith and promise; and that if he had once satisfied the heate of his love with her, he thought then he might be called home againe. Syphax having vnderstood Scipioes message sent him, he answered, that indeed it was time, not only to leave the league with the CARTHAGINIANS, but also to giue vp all thought of war; and fo promifed, that he would be a good meane to make peace. Sci. pio gaue good care vnto it, and caught hold of an excellent fine deuice. He chose the valiantest fouldiers in his army, apparelled them like slaues, and made them waitevpon the Ambassadors, and gaue them instructions whatthey should do. These fellowes, whilest the Ambassadors and King Syphax were in talke together about the articles and conditions of peace, and that the confultation held longer then it was wont to do, they went and walked vp and downet frough the enemies campe, to fee all the waies and entries into it, according vnto Scipioes instructions. After they had done this divers times, they came againe to Scipio. Truce was take for a time, the which being expired, Scipio seemed to make preparation for wars, (as being out of hope of any peace) and to make his army ready by sea, preparing engines of battery to returne to besiege VTICA, as he had done before. He gaue out this rumorthrough althe country, to perswade his enemies that it was true; howbeit having called the Captaines & pettie Captaines of his army together, he made them privile to his intent and enterprise. He told them that both the enemies camps lay not farre afunder; of the which, the one of them had all their tents and cabines of wood; and the building of the other camp was all of reeds, so that they were both easie to be burnt. Wherupon having sent for Masinisa and Caises Lalius to come vnto him, he gave them charge about midnight to giue alarme vnto Syphax camp, and to set it on fire: & that he himselfe on the other side, would fet vponthe CARTHAGINIAN'S camp. They two obeyed Scipioes commandement, performed his will without delay, & came at the houre appointed them to affaile the NYMIDTANS camp, and so did set the houses of reeds on fire; which took fire in such fort, as the slame was immediatly roud about the camp. The NVMIDIANS at the first thinking the fire had come by misfortune, ranne thither straight vnarmed to quenchit. But when they found themselues among the legions of the Romaines, and that there was nothing but killing downeright, seeing themselues so compassed in on al sides, they saw their best remedie was to flie. On the other side also, where Scipioes army was, the CARTHAGINIAN'S camp was almost alburnt, and the enemies put to flight with such cruell slaughter, that some writers affirme, there were slaine that night about forty thousand men, aswell Carthaginians as Numidians. This great ouerthrow and slaughter being caried to CARTHAGE, did put the citizens there in such a feare and terror, that some thought best to send for Hannibal out of ITALY, & others gaue aduice to make peace with Scipio. Howbeit the BAR e IN IAN faction which was rich and wealthy, and altogether against the beace makers, they fo prevailed, that they leavied a new power to begin war againe. King Syphax and Haldrubal having leavied a great multitude of footmen and horsemen againe, renued their armie sooner then was looked for, & came againe to pitch their campe directly ouer against the enemies. Scipio having vinderstanding of that, would not tarie, but determined to give the battel, whilest his men were in good heart & willing to fight. So it chanced at the first, by the nearenes of both their camps, that there were certaine skirmishes; but in the end, the armies came to joyne battel, & the Romain's fought with fuch courage & terror, that at the first onset they made the NUMIDIANS & CARTHAGINIANS flie, and flue the most part of them. Haldrubal & Syphan scaped, by flying out of the flaughter. Scipio fent Masinisa and Cains Lalius with the light horsemen to give the chase. Syphax being come into Nymidia, and from thence into his own realme and kingdome, he leauied an army in hast of all forts of people, and came to meete with Masinista & Caim Lelius, & was not afraid to give them battell, But it was a fond part of him, confidering that he was nothing like so strong as his enemy, neither for number of fighting men, nor yet in likelihood of fouldiers. For neither the fouldiers nor captaines of his army were matchable with the fouldiers and captaines of the Romaines camp: and therfore king Syphax was eafily ouercome by fuch skilful fouldiers, & moreouer was him felfetaken in battel, with many other great noble Maje full men, whom Masinisa would hardly have looked for: and then they were brought vnto Scipio. At ansonerthe first there was a maruellous ioy among them, when it was told them that king Syphax should taken in bebrought prisoner vnto the camp: but afterwards when they saw him bound, they were alsory bassed. to see him in such pitifull state, remembring his former greatnes & regall maiesty. For they called to mind how famous the name of this King had bin but a litle before, what wonderfull great wealth he had, & also the power of sogreat a realme & kingdome. Howbeit Scipio the ROMAIN Confull received him very curreoufly, and gently asked him what he meant to change his mind in that fort, & what moved him to make war with the Romain Bs. The the king remebring his former friendship& faithful promise broken, he boldly told him, that it was the love he bare to his wife Sophonisha, who only had procured him to deale fo dishonorably with the Romaines: howbeit, that he had so smarted for it, as al others might take example by him, and beware how they breake their promise. And yet, that this was a great comfort to him in his extreme misery to feethat his mortal enemy Masinisa was so taken with that frenzie and mad humor, wher with he before was possessed. For after Syphax was ouercome & taken, Masimisa went into Cyrtha, the chiefe city of the realme, the which he wan, and found Sophonishathere, with whom he felin fancie, who after she had finely wrapped him in with her deccitful flatteries & kindnes, he promised that where heralfo to deliuerher out of the Romains hands: and because he might the better performe his love with promise made, he took her to his wife & maried her. When Scipio was informed of these things, it grieucd him maruelloufly. For it was knowne to all men, that Syphax was ouercome vnder the conduct, & through the Romains meanes: and therfore althat was belonging to Syphan, was at the disposition of the Romains. Wherfore if Masiniss had without Scipioes consent, undertaken to defend Sophonubaes quarell, then it appeared plainly, he despised the authority of the Consul, and the maiefly of the people of Rome. Furthermore, his filthy lust did aggrauate his fault the more, the which seemed so much more intolerable, by how much the cottinecy of the ROMAIN Consul was the greater, the which Masinisa saw daily before his eyes, and might have bene apaterne and example vnto him. For Scipio besides many other proofes & shewes of his vertues, in of scipio. al places where he obtained victory, he alwaies kept the women vndefiled, which were take prifoners. So Scipio being offended with Masinisa, (though he shewed it not before company) receiued him very louingly at his returneto the camp yet afterwards notwithstanding, taking him aside, he so sharply reproued him, that he made him know what it was to obey a moderate, and also a seuere captaine. The battell Scipioss the Cartha.

P. Scipio about peace: either because he was afraid of the good fortune of this yong man, or else for that he mistrusted he could not otherwise helpe his countrey and commonwealth, which he faw decaying & like to be destroyed. Wherfore a place was appointed, where they might meet according to his desire; where when they were both met, they had long talke together about the ending of this war. In the end Scipio offered Hannibal fuch conditions of peace; that by them it appeared the Romaines were not weary of war, and that Scipio himselfe being a yong man, had better hope to obtaine victory, then great defire to hearken to peace. So, all hope of peace being fet aside, they brake off their talke, and the next morning two famous and worthy Captaines of the most noble nations that could be, prepared themselves to battel, either to give or takeaway in short time from their common-weales, the seigniorie and Empire of all the world. The place where they employed altheir force, and where this famous battel was fought, as it is reported, Was by the city ZAMA: in the which the ROMAINES being conquerours, did first make the Elephants flie, then the horsemen, and in the endbrake so fiercely into the footmen, that they ouerthrew althe armie. It is reported, that there were flaine & taken by the Romain B saboue forty thousand Carthaginians. Hannibal fled out of the fury of the battel, & faued himself, though that day he had shewed himselfe like a valiant & famous Captaine, For at this battell he had set his army inbetter order then euer he had done before, and had strengthened it both with the commodity of the place, and reliefe beside: and euen in the very sury and terror of the battel he fo bestirred himself among his souldiers, that the enemies themselues did commend and praise him for a noble Captaine. After this victory, Seipio meeting with Vermina king Syphax fon, that brought aide to the Carthaginians, he put him to flight, and came and brought his army to the walles and hauen of CARTHAGE, thinking (as indeed it fell out) that the CARTHAGINIANS would fue to him for peace. For, as the CARTHAGINIAN's before had bene very good foldiers, and ready to make wars: fo were they now become timorous and faint hearted, specially when they faw their General Hannibal ouercome, in whom they chiefly reposedal their hope & trust, for defence of their country. Wherefore they being (as I haue faid) out of heart, sent ambassadors vnto Scipio, to pray him that according to his accustomed clemencie, he would grant them peace. Now was great fuite made at RomB, to have the governmet of the province of AFRICK and one of the new Confuls made haste to come and make war, with such charge and preparation as was meet for his dignity and calling: and therefore Scipio doubting that another should carie away the glory for ending of so great a warre, he was the better contented to yeeld to the CARTHAGINIAN ambassadors requests. So the capitulation of the articles of peace was offered vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, according to the conquerors mind: and besides al other things, the whole fleet of all their ships and gallies (in the which their hope consisted much) were taken fro them. For when the whole fleet was burnt, it was such a lamentable fight vnto them al, that there was no other thing but weeping and lamenting through the whole city, as if CARTHAGE had bindestroyed and razed to the very ground. For as some do write, there were fine hundred ships burnt of all forts. These things therefore should make vs al beware of humane frailty, the which we often forget in our prosperity. For they that before perswaded themselues to conquer the world, after they had wonne fomany great battels & victories of the enemy, and in maner conquered all ITALY, and so valiantly besides besieged the city of ROME, were in shorttime after brought to such misery and extremity, that all their power and force being onercome, they had no more left them but the walles of CARTHAGE, and yet they were not fure to keepe them, but through the speciall grace and fauour of the enemy. After these things were done, Scipio by decree of the Senate, did not onely restore King Masinisa to his Realme againe, buralso adding thereunto the best part of all king Syphax countrey, they made him one of the mightiest kings of all Africk: and afterwards he gaue honourable gifts vnto euery man as he had descrued. In Soppos 70 fine, after he had setall the affaires of Africk a at good stay, he brought his army back againe into ITAL Y:at what time there came to Rom a a world of people, to see so great & famous a captaine, returning from such wonderfull great victories. So he entred into Rome with pompe of triumph, Terentius Culeo following him with a hat on his head, because that through his fauor and friendship he was taken out of bondage. Polybius writeth, that king Syphax was led in triumph:howbeit some say he died before, Scipio triumphed. Indeed diuers that did triumph, some before him during the warres of the CARTHAGINIANS, and others afterwards in the warres of MACEDONIA & Asia, they made greater shew of plate, both of gold & silver in their triumph, and led also a great number of prisoners: howbeit one only Hannibal that was ouercome, and the glory of fogreat a warreended, did make the triumph of P. Scipio so excellent and famous, that it far passed all the gold and magnificent pompe of all others triumphs. For after AFRICK B was conquered, no nation then was assigned to be ouercome by the Romaines. For he made this province as it were a bridge and open passage to increase and enlarge the Empire of Rom B, both in Macedon, and also in Asia, & in other parts of the world besides. Now Scipio (whom Imay rightly call African, after y conquest of Africk) being returned to Rome, he lacked notemporall dignities nor honours. For in the Counsell holden for the election of Censors, although there were divers of the noblest houses of Rome that sued for that office, yet he himlelf, and Alius Perus were preferred before all the rest, and after they were created Censors, Allius For they did gouerne in their office likegood men, and with good quietnesse. Afterwards the Cenmey and Southful then once the Southful with Society African Prince of the Senate: Scipio the which dignity was wont to be given to them onely, that obtained the type of all honour, Prince of through their great conquests and benefits done to their country. Shortly after, he was againe the Senate, chosen Consul with Sempronius Longus, the sonne of that Sempronius whom Hannibal ouercame scipio and in that great ouerthrow, at the battell by the river of Trebia. They two were the first (as it is reported) that deuided the Noblemen and Senators from the people, in the shew-place to see paflime. This separation was very odious to the people of Rome, and they were maruellously offended with the Confuls forit, because they tooke it, that increasing the honour of the state of the Senators, they thereby did discountenance and imbase them. Some say also, that Scipio A-RICAN afterwards repented himselfe that he had taken away the old custome, & brought in a new. At that time there fell out great variance betwixt Masinisa and the Carthaginians, touthing their borders and confines. Whereupon the Senate fent Scipio thither with two other commissioners: who after they had heard the cause of their quarrell, they left the matter as they foundit, and would proceed no further in it. And this they did, because that the CARTHAGI- The craftie NIAN'S being troubled with civill warres at home, should take vponthem no other warres a- counsel of broad, neither should have ley sure to attempt any alteration other wise. For the Romaines had great war with king Antiochus, and Hannibal Carthaginian was there with him, who still firred vp the old enemies against the Romaines, and practifed to raise vp new enemies against them, and in all things to counsell the Carthaginians to cast away the yoke of bondage, which the Romains had brought the into under the title of peace, & to proue the friendship of the kings. How beit shortly after, the ROMAINES having obtained victory, & driven king Antiochus out of GRECE, they intended also to conquer As IA: and therfore all their hope was in Scipio African, as a manthat was borneto end wars of great importance. Howbeit Lucius Scipio and Caius Lalius were Consuls, and either ofthem made suite for the gouernment of As IA. The matter being confulted vpon, the Senate stood doubtfull what judgement they should give, betwixttwo fo famous men. Howbeit, because Lalius was in better fauour with the Senate, and in greater estimation the Senate began to take his part. But when P. Cornelius Scipio African, the elder brother of Lucius Scipio, praied the Senatethat they would not dishonour his house so, and told them that his brother had great vertues in him, and was besides very wise, and that he himfelfe also would be his Lieutenant: he had no sooner spoken the words, but the Senators receiued him with great ioy, and presently did put them all out of doubt. So it was ordained in open Senate, that Lucius Scipio should go into GRECE to make warre with the ÆTOLIANS, and that from thence he should go into As 11, if he thought good, to make war with King Antiochus: and also that he should take his brother Scipio African with him, because he should goe against Hannibal, that was in Antiochus army. Who can but wonder at the loue and naturall affection Thenanural of Publius Cornelius Scipio African, the which he first shewed from his youth vnto his father Cornelius, and afterwards also vnto his brother Lucius Scipio, considering the great things he had to his brodone: For, notwithstanding he was that African by name that had ouercome Hannibal, that the Lucius had triumphed ouer the CARTHAGINIANS, and excelled all others in praise of martiall discipline: yet of his own good nature he made himselfe inferior to his yonger brother, because he might have the honour of obtaining the government of that province from his fellow Conful Lelius, that was fo well beloued, and of great estimation. Lucius Scipio the Consul brought great honourto his country by that war, for that he followed the found and faithfull counfell of his brother. For first of all going into GRECE, he took truce for fixe moneths with y ÆTOLIANS, Afterwards also he wanne Prusas king of BTTHINIA from Antiochus friendship, who before was wauering vp and downe, doubtfull which fidetotake, and all through his brother Africans meanes and practife. So the authority of the African wasvery great, and all those that would obtain any thing of the Conful, came first to the African to be their meane & intercessor. Now when he came into Asia, Antiochus ambassador, and Heraclides Bizantian, came vnto him to offerto make peace, and after they had openly told their message, perceiuing that they could not obtaine reasonable conditions of peace, they prinarly talked with Scipio African, as they were commanded, and pra-Gifed the best they could to make him king Antiochus friend. For they told him, that Antiochus would fend his yonger sonne which he had taken, and furthermore that he would willingly make him his companion in the gouernement of all his Realme, onely referuing the name and The fidding title of King. Howbeit P. Scipio, excelling no leffe in faithfulnesse and bountie, then in many other vertues, after he had answered them to all other matters, he told them, that for his son he would take him for a maruellous friendly gift: & that for a prinate good turne, he would do the P.Scipio to best he could to require him with the like: Howbeit, that he would counsell the King about all things to leave off thought of warre, and to receive those offers and conditions of peace which the Senate and people of Rome would offer him. Shortly after, Antiochus fent P. Scipio his fon according to his promise: who (as it is reported) had bin taken prisoner from the first beginning of the war, as he went from Chalcide vnto Oricam: or as other writers fay, as he passed by in a pinnace. Yet some hold opinion, that he was taken as he went to discouer the counsell of the enemies, and that he was then fent againe vnto his father, lying ficke at the city of ELEA. This great curtefic of king Antiochus was maruellous well thought of by the African, & not without cause: for to see his son after he had bene away so long, it did greatly lighten his spirits, and discased body. But P. Scipio to shew some token of a thankfull mind, prayed the Ambassadours that came vnto him, greatly to thanke King Antiochus for the exceeding pleasurche haddone him, to fend him his sonne. Afterwards he gaue Antiochus aduice also, that he should not giue battell, till he vnderstood of his returne from EL EA to the camp. So Antiochus being perswaded by the authority of fo worthy a man, he kept close in his camp for a certaine time, and determined to draw the warre out at length, hoping in the end that he might come to speake with the Confull, by the Africans meanes. But afterwards, the Conful camping hard by Magnesia, did so vexe and prouoke the enemie, that the King came out to battell, and set his men in battell ray. It is reported that Hannibal himselse was present at the battell, being one of the Generals for the King, So Antiochus being ouercome, and his army discomfited, perceiuing that there was no helpe in his affaires, he came vnto the African, (who being newly recourred of his ficknesse, came to the campe a little after the field was wonne) and by his meanes obtained of the Confull to be contented to talke of peace. When Antiochus ambaffadours were cometo the 655. of peace campe, and had humbly craued pardon in the behalfe of their King, and also prayed that they would give them such conditions of peace, as they best liked of: Scipio African with the confent of them all answered them, that it was nor the manner of the ROMAINES to yeeld to aduerfity, neither also to be proud in prosperity: and therefore that he now made him the selfe same offer and conditions of peace, which he did before the victory. That the king should not meddle with EVROPE: that he should surrender up all he had in Asia, from the mountaine Taurus, vnto the river of Tanais: that he should pay tribute twenty yeares together: that he should also put in such hostages as the Consull would chuse out: and that specially about all the rest, they should deliuer Hannibal Carthaginian unto the Consull, who was the only author and procurer of this warre. But he, as we have written in his life, perceiuing that king Antiochus army was ouerthrowne both by sea and by land, escaped the ROMAINES hands, and went vnto Prustar King of Bythinia. Antiochus having accepted the offers and conditions of peace, said, that the ROMAINES vsed him very fauourably, to ridhim of so great care, and to appoint him so small a kingdome.
